No compensation plan upsets owners

Countryside opened up to ramblers

By JILL SHERMAN, CHIEF POLITICAL CORRESPONDENT

RURAL landowners accused the Government of "destroying the goodwill of the countryside" yesterday by promising ramblers a legal right to roam over four million acres of mountains, moors, heaths and

They insisted that the Goveroment had misled the electorate by opting for legislation ment. And they were furious that hey would not be compen-sated for having to open their land to the public.

The decision to go ahead with Labour's manifesto pledge that it would force owners to open up their land, was seen as a surprise victory for John Prescott over Tony Blair, who had favoured the voluntary approach. But Michael Meacher, the Environment Minister, did not not a timescale on the legislation and was unable to give a commitment that it would be this side of an election. Governthat it would take time to draw up maps to decide what land should be open to the public. Legislation is unlikely before 2001, and there are certain to be further protests from the countryside lobby — it was the Countryside March last spring that prompted Mr Blair to adopt a more conciliatory approach. Mr Meacher told MPs yesterday that all the evidence showed that a voluntary approach was inade-quate. Measures had to be introduced "to make sure people will be free in perpetuity" to explore open countryside. He also argued that landowners would not be entitled to compensation because there was no evidence that land values would fall.

Even so, officials said that the measures would cost about £3 million a year to implement, with a one-off starting cost of £8 million for feating. gates and notices. Funding would be provided by the government, the National Lottery and local councils.

The new rules would not apply to any developed land or agricultural land other than that used for extensive graz-ing, Mr Meacher said. There was no question of people being given the right to trample over crops or through other people's gardens, and dogs would have to be put on a lead.

He also disclosed that local "access forums" would be set up which would bring together interested parties, including landowners, conservationists and councils, to agree how access should be managed. But the Countryside Landowners Association was furious that the Government was refusing to provide compensation. "The Government's decisision to proceed with a statutory right of access on foot alone mountain, moor, heath, downland and commonland has destroyed the goodwill of the countryside and confirmed the worst fears of all who took part in the Countryside March." a spokesman said:

The Government is aware that all legislation in the UK must stand up to the Protocol of the European Human Rights Convention. We believe that a statutory right of access without appropriate compen-sation will fail this test."

Richard Burge, chief execu-tive of the Countryside Alliance, said: "The Government proposals disappoint us as the emphasis is on creation of rights for the majority, rather than protection of livelihoods of those rural people who re-side in the areas targeted by this legislation.

"Insufficient emphasis has been placed on the responsibilities of walkers and how they will be enforced. However, we are pleased that Mr Meacher recognises that you cannot im-pose a national solution on the tapestry of the British countryside and its people.

The Ramblers Association welcomed the proposals, provided they were backed up by early legislation. "This is an historic moment," a spokeswoman said. "This is the first time any government has recognised that landowners cannot be trusted to open uncultivated land voluntarily."

The association was, however, suspicious of the appointment of Ewen Cameron as head of the Countryside Agency, which will be given powers to police the right to roam. Mr Cameron, a former president of the Country Landowners Association, will have the power to grant temporary access exemptions for landowners for breeding or shooting seasons.

Monica Lewinsky's tears were put down to jetlag and flu - but she still managed to sign her name eight times a minute

Monica beats the Iron Lady

By CAROL MIDGLEY. MEDIA CORRESPONDENT

PERHAPS it was jet lag or possibly the bagpipe music that serenaded her entrance into Harrods. But after just five minutes in the company of the British media, the woman who survived two Grand Jury hearings and six interrogations by Kenneth Starr's prosecutors had to be led away in tears.

Monica Lewinsky, who had arrived for the first signing session of Andrew Morton's biography, looked alarmed by the 150-strong wall of waiting cameramen. And faced with a barrage of shouts of "smile Monica", "over here, Monica", "hold the book up, come Wrong foot, page 4 on!", she whispered "I can't do Leading article, page 23 it" before being ushered to a side room wiping her eyes. Harrods staff quickly ex-plained she had "a bit of flu". "Monica hasn't been feeling too well", a spokesman told waiting customers. "I think she was feeling a bit overwhelmed. It was decided that she should leave the room for just a few minutes after it became too much."

Thirty minutes later, she reemerged, flushed but smiling. and began signing books at the impressive rate of eight a minute for the 400 people in a queue through the books' business management and military history section into the travel section and beyond. . Ms Lewinsky, sitting at an ornate table and wearing a navy blue pin-striped suit, smiled gamely at most of them saying simply "thank you very much" as they ssed on their best wishes. Chris Mitchell, from Missouri, said: "I asked her to put the date and she said 'I don't even know what day it is." Mrs Anne Kersey, 39, who was first in the queue after waiting for six hours, said: "I told her it was terribly brave of her to come here today. I said, 'I will pray for you, but most of all I feel sorry for your mother. It must be so hard for her to watch you being chased around.' She said it was kind of me to say so. She was shaking like a leaf - she looked absolutely terrified."

Harrods, however, declared themselves delighted by her visit, which broke the store's record for sales at a book signing. Baroness Thatcher's appearance sold 1,000 copies of her autobiography The Downing Street Years. Ms Lewinsky sold 1,150.

Michael Howard to quit Shadow Cabinet

BY PHILIP WEBSTER POLITICAL EDITOR

MICHAEL HOWARD is to step down from the Tory frontbench in a move that will help William Hague to make another break with the past.

The most senior survivor of the Major Government has told Mr Hague that he wants to go in the next Shadow Cabinet reshuffle, expected in the summer. And he may be the first of several to bow out in the coming months. Sir Nor-man Fowler, the Shadow Home Secretary, has always made plain that he is ready to stand aside whenever Mr Hague wants.

Mr Howard, 57, said last night that he had served on the frontbench for 14 consecutive years and that was "probably long enough for anyone". He said: "I have told "Wil-liam that I want to leave the Shadow Cabinet at the next reshuffle. I want to speak on many topics other than for-eign affairs. I intend to be an active MP and to support him from the backbenches." The Shadow Foreign Secretary is understood to have made his decision shortly before he went to South Africa in January and to have written telling Mr Hague of his inten-

While Mr Howard was away reports surfaced that Mr Hague wanted both him and John Redwood to stand down, although the party leadership denied the stories outright. Mr Hague apparently assured Mr Howard that the reports were wrong and told him that if he changed his mind about going, he should let him know.

However, Mr Howard has decided to bow out and to pursue his business interests - he already has three non-executive directorships. He also intends to continue as a backbencher, and to contest the next election.

The news of Mr Howard's imminent departure will inevitably be seen as another example of a senior Tory deciding that the party has little chance of winning the next election.

A BREAST implant originally extolled for its safety was withdrawn by the Government yesterday after patients com-plained of swelling and inflammation.

Trilucent implants contain soya oil, which was claimed to be completely safe. But up to 30 of the 5,000 women fitted with them have suffered reactions that may have been linked to the implants leaking. The effects disappear when the implants are removed, but, on the advice of the Medical Devices Agency, the Health Department ordered that the implant should be withdrawn

pending tests. It said that not enough was known about

long-term safety, the rate of breakdown of the soya oil and what it does to the body.

The distributors, Lipomatrix and Collagen Aesthetics In-ternational, based in Thame, Oxfordshire, agreed and patients were advised to speak to their surgeon or GP. Helplines have been set up by the Health Department (0800 004440) and the distributors

(0800 216 613). Since the Trilucent implant was introduced to Britain in 1995, the Medical Devices Agency has received 74 "adverse incident" reports. Many were from women unhappy with the appearance of their breasts. But between 20 and 30 cases involved localised swelling and redness.

The problem has been caused by the soya oil breaking down differently from the artificially-aged oil used when the implant was first approved. The effect is to create some biologically-active substances which have caused inflammation. The new tests aim to discover how toxic these substances are. Amanda Cameron, a vicepresident of Collagen International, insisted the product was safe, adding: "I would have these implants tomorrow."

Blair diverts right-to-roam activists along the Third Way

wo years ago. new La-bour fought a general election promising a "right to roam". People assumed that "right" meant a real right: a right in law.

Yesterday afternoon a minister rephrased the Marxist "right to roam" to the more Third Way "right of area access": restricted the countryside involved to "mountain. moor, heath and down"; excluded Scotland: placed Wales under the care of its incoming assembly: and told MPs that prepare. Ministers could not Pendle), blinking in disbelief guarantee anything this side of a general election. Why, maps would have to be made. in short, the minister restated a two-year-old intention, focused and somewhat restricted, but failed to say when. He was greeted by something approaching sobs of re-lief. Labour backbenchers had feared the Government was going to abandon the commitment altogether. "I feel kinda warm towards new Labour at the moment," gasped Gordon Prentice (Lab. Stroppy Left, at the sudden warmth of his feelings for the Government.

As hairy lefties behind them grovelled in relief, one watched ministers more in admiration than mockery. What an achievement - so to fan your supporters' fears that when at last you tell them you will do a bit of what you promised, they fall on your neck in gratitude. Tony Blair's continuing ability to combine the hero's swagger with the hedger's creep is astonishing. And the Tories played Labour's game. One after the other they rose yesterday, pink with indignation that someone was going to start consulting on the drawing up of a set of maps which could one day if they are ever agreed - be used as the basis for an openended consultation. Oh -- and the chair of the agency being set up to consider this is a former Chairman of the Country Landowners' Association. Gentlemen, this is not the end of civilisation as we know it.

Welsh Nationalists were cross too. Elfyn Llwyd (Plaid Cymru, Meironnydd & Conwy) shocked the minister, Michael Meacher, by calling the right to roam a "right to traipse". Nicholas Soames (C.

Mid Sussex), in a moving plea for the safety of nesting chicks - as heartfelt as any Walrus tears for little oysters — all but called it the 'right to spoil my shooting". Everybody with a beard was enthusiastic, but there are beards and beards. Jeremy Corbyn (Lab. Islington N) has a progressive urban thinker's beard. He couldn't wait to send his constituents (the most densely-packed in Britain, he said) to disturb Mr Soames's chicks. Tories "pretend to love the countryside, for the purposes of killing". Andrew Bennett (Lab, Denton & Reddish), has a rambler's beard: a big black bush in walking boots, with a squeaky voice, "Good news!" he twittered. Bearded Paddy Tipping, a minister, nodded happily on the bench.

As Labour chirruped and the Tories squawked, an unworthy thought struck this sketch. No government, sure-ly, could finalise a foxhunting Bill until they had sorted out access to the countryside —

And how can they sort out have agreed their maps? And how can mapmakers begin mapping until the new Countryside Agency has agreed what they are to map? And . . . my goodness me - another general election already! Clear the legislative pipeline. How time flies.

Ulster is given Good Friday deadline again

By Martin Fletcher, chief ireland correspondent

THE Government yesterday gave Unionist and republican leaders a deadline of Good Friday to break the deadlock over IRA disarmament or face the collapse of the peace accord reached exactly a year earlier.

Mo Mowlam abandoned tomorrow's target date for creating the Province's new executive, despite claims by Gerry Adams that such a capitulation to Unionist intransigence would plunge the process "into crisis, big-time".

But the Northern Ireland Secretary promised to trigger the mechanism for establishing the executive by April 2, come what may. At that point one side or the other would have to give ground or Ulster would face the prospect of wholesale violence. Dr Mowlam said she had "no Plan B".

Sources said she was deliberately forcing the issue because any hope of resolving the impasse will vanish after Easter. The marching season begins on Easter Monday and Ian Paisley has pledged to turn June's Euro-elections into a ref-crendum on the accord. The effect will be to recreate the pressure-cooker atmosphere that produced the accord in a frantic final week of negotiation last year. Both Dublin and Washington are likely to be involved. Unless believed to have endorsed this the deadlock is broken by the

Dr Mowlam's hopes of transferring power to the executive tomorrow were dashed by the IRA's refusal to start disarming and the Unionists' refusal to admit Sinn Fein to government until it does.

Just hours before her statement, Mr Adams, Sinn Fein's president, declared that the Government's failure to proceed tomorrow would cause a major crisis. He said that he would do all in his power to ensure that the IRA remained on ceasefire, but some people were using the decommissioning issue to try to force Sinn Fein out of the political process and the IRA back to war.

David Trimble, Northern treland's First Minister, will meet Mr Adams and Martin McGuinness at Stormont today, but neither side anticipates progress. Next week President Clinton will bring all his influence to end of March. Dr Mowlam will trigger the mechanism for establishing the executive.

The politicians would then be in uncharted and danger ous waters, Mr Trimble could seek Sinn Fein's expulsion, or "park" the process by demanding a government review of the accord's implementation. Dr Mowlam and David Andrews, the Irish Foreign Minister, increased the pressure on Sinn Fein and the IRA yesterday when they signed four inter-governmental treaties to establish the new cross-border and British-Irish bodies once the executive is formed. Both ministers emphasised that just "one piece of the jigsaw" remained to be put in place.

The Irish Times blamed the IRA for the deadlock, saying that "from the beginning the IRA has not moved a milli-metre". But Niall O'Dowd, a friend of Mr Adams, cautioned against the "mistaken assumption that the IRA would not go back to war under any circumstances".

Something of the night is now someone of the past

By MARK INGLEFIELD, POLITICAL REPORTER

MICHAEL HOWARD'S departure from frontline politics is unlikely to trigger communal weeping in the Tory party but few Conservatives will deny that they have lost one of their higgest hitters.

It is this paradox — that he was good but never well liked - that probably scuppered Mr Howard's attempt to lead the Tories in 1997, after their general election defeat. Mr Howard almost persuaded William Hague to drop out and agree to be his deputy if Mr Howard won the race. Despite apparently agreeing to the deal over champagne, Mr Hague backed out the next day. Many of Mr Howard's tation for smugness. But this did not hinder a rapid rise up the ministerial ladder. He entered politics late, at the age of 42, and went on to hold a succession of jobs before becoming Home Secre-tary in 1993. It was at the Home Office that he set his political profile in stone. He tackled crime with an iron fist, but a number of prison escapes undermined his credibility.

And although his tubthumping anti-crime speeches delighted the party faithful. one of his outbursts - that children brought up without fathers were likely to turn to crime - backfired terribly. On cue, the former husband of his wife, the Sixties model Sandra Paul, revealed that Mr Howard's adulterous relationship with her had taken away their son from his father. A source close to Mr Hague said: "He has been a thoroughly professional member of the Shadow Cabinet. He has run his opposite number ragged. He has provided a valuable source of advice, his experience will be missed." Mr Howard made plain his depar-ture had "absolutely nothing" to do with Mr Hague's new "kitchen-table Toryism", disclosed in The Times yesterday.

Hague supports people's march on euro

By JAMES LANDALE POLITICAL CORRESPONDENT

WILLIAM HAGUE yesterday backed the idea of a "people's march" against the euro as he launched the Tory commission that will argue the case for keeping the pound.

The Conservative leader also outlined the party's new strategy of focusing on "kitch-en table" issues, citing poten-tial membership of the euro as a good example Mr Hague said a mass rally in London against the euro, modelled on the Countryside Alliance march last year which attracted 300,000 people, was "a very good idea".

"It is vital to show that there are people of all political persuasions, and none, who feel very strongly about this. A march may be one of the ways of doing that," he added.

The move came as the Anti-Maastricht Alliance announced that it would hold a march against the euro on May 29. The so-called March for Freedom will take place in conjunction with a ceremony at Runnymede where the Magna Carta was signed. The new euro commission, headed by Sir John Nott, the former Tory Cabinet minister. is expected to report later this year on the economic benefits of Britain remaining outside the euro. Set up largely to provide an alternative to the Government's national changeover plan, it will technically be independent of Tory Central Office and privately financed. Sir John. 67, currently chairman of Lazards Brothers merchant bank, said: "There are 400 countries in the world with their own currency. I am not sure why we shouldn't have our own."

Brown set to boost enterprise

BY PHILIP WEBSTER POLITICAL EDITOR

GORDON BROWN will today present a "broadly neutral" Budget designed to leave room for the Bank of England to make further cuts in interest rates.

In what he described last night as a package for "work, enterprise and families", the Chancellor, who met the Prime Minister twice yesterday to finalise his plans, is expected to unveil tax reforms, including moves towards the long-heralded

10p starting rate of tax. This is expected to be met by the phased or outright removal of other reliefs, including the married couple's allowance and the remainder of mortgage interest tax re-lief. With interest rates low, now would be a relatively painless time to do it. The Chancellor is likely to signal that the taxation of child benefit for higher rate taxpayers will start next year, although an increase in the benefit is also expected

The Chancellor is believed to be taking a cautious outlook, partly because of revenue shortfalls in areas such as Exciseduty on tobacco and tax on North Sea oil. He also wants to send a message to the markets that he will not repeat the mistakes the Conservatives made a decade ago.

Help for business is likely in the form of tax breaks for research and development by small firms and incentives for employees to invest in their own companies

Mr Brown last night told ITN that his Budget would be aimed at increasing the country's wealth and making it more enterprising. He said: "It is a better deal for work, for enterprise and for families. We have had a major review of economic policy and how we can be more productive and wealthy as a country. I will be bringing forward some of the conclu-sions." Mr Brown will announce plans for every household to receive leaflets explaining how taxes are raised and funds spent. He will extend the welfare-to-work programme to the over-fifties. Measures to tax emissions of carbon to meet Britain's commitment at the 1997 Kyoto summit are expected. Mr Brown is committed to raising the petrol duty by at least 6 per cent a year, and to increasing duty on ciga-rettes by 5 per cent as part of health policy. Mr Brown's third Budget will last about an hour. His refreshment will be Scottish water.

Labour to keep euro out of poll

BY ROLAND WATSON, POLITICAL CORRESPONDENT

LABOUR will try to avoid campaigning on the single currency in June's European elections amid fears that proeuro posturing could cost the party votes. The strategy reflects concern in some quarters of Downing Street that the Government's "gear-change" lowards the euro is in danger of alienating the public. The approach sets up the prospect of an election campaign in which the central issue facing Britain and Europe is kept to the fringes. The Tories are yet to settle their campaign strategy but are worried that focusing on the euro would further divide them. Tony Blair is being warned that the National Changeover Plan, announced last month, has placed ministers too far ahead of prevailing opinion. Senior MPs are now looking to those Cabinet ministers less enthusiastic about pursu-ine a fast track to the single currency, such as Jack Straw. the Home Secretary, and Margaret Beckett, the Leader of the House, to "set alarm bells ringing" and rein in the Prime Minister and Gordon Brown. Mrs Beckett, Labour's election campaign co-ordinator. has made clear privately that the euro should not feature large in the elections. Michael Heseltine and Kenneth Clarke have delayed their involvement in the cross-

party campaign to promote the single currency until after the June 10 poll antid fears that their trumpeting of the euro would damage the Tory cause. Although William Hague sees the Government's pro-euro stance as an opportunity for the Opposition to reconnect with large parts of the electorate, he is also aware that pushing the issue too far could raflame Tory divisions.

Thirty-three librarians from local authorities across England have just over 12 months to grade 1,000 books for the Branching Out scheme. If it proves to be a success, the data-base could be expanded to cov-er more than 5,000 works.

"Where we shop, how we shop and what we buy is a living statement of what we believe," states the liturgy. "Shop-ping which involves the shopper in making ethical and religious judgments may be nearer to the worship God requires than any number of pious prayers in church."

The book, the first of two millennium worship books, has been published days after a couple announced their plans to have their wedding blessed in a supermarket. At the same time, the Lakeside shopping centre in Essex has announced plans to build Britain's first shoppers' chapel.

The millennium shopping meditation is part of the proposed Harvest Festival liturgy published in New Start Worship (£8, New Start 2000). The prayers have been put together by the ecumenical group Churches Together in England which is co-ordinating the Churches' millennium plans. The same group is responsible for the millennium prayer or "resolution" which makes no mention of Christ, and is also making plans for a "millennium candle" to be distributed to every home in England for New Year's Eve.

The liturgy advises: "If we take our roles as God's stewards seriously, shoppers collectively are a very powerful group." It adds: "If, when we ourselves are not on the poverty line, we always go for the cheapest price, without considering that this price is achieved through ethically unacceptable working conditions somewhere in the world, we are making a statement about our understanding of the word neighbour."

The name of the footballer cited in literary mystery

FROM RICHARD OWEN IN ROME

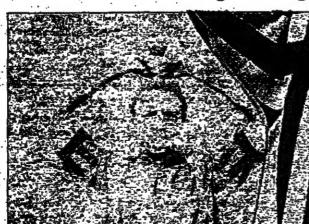

A FORMER Watford and Engand footballer is at the centre of a literary mystery in Italy involving the novelist Umberto Eco and a group of anarchists. The group use the collective identity "Luther Blissett" to

Blissett played — briefly — for AC Milan, but scored only five times in 30 games for the club in 1982, earning him the nickname "Luther Missit" and giving rise to the gibe that Mi-lan had bought the wrong black Watford player". (The 'right" player would have been John Barnes.) In March 1997 four young men accused of travelling on a train without a ticket all answered "Luther Blissett" when asked for their names in court. It emerged that the loosely or-ganised group of self-styled an-archists had been struck by Blissett in Italy.

In his latest incarnation, "Luther Blissett" has written Q, a 650-page novel set in Renissance times, with a mixture of real and imaginary charac-ters. It is full of historical and literary allusions in the manner of Eco, author of The Name of the Rose. Described as "a saga of good and evil". the novel is set against a background of espionage, the Inquisition's ruthless struggle to root out heresy. Martin Luther and the Reformation, holy wars and peasant uprisings. "O" is the code name of the

Ramblers fear boot is on the wrong foot

THE new Countryside Agen-cy, which will police the right to roam, is to be headed by a former president of the Countryside Landowners' Association, who is an outspoken opponent of increased access.

Ewen Cameron will have a key role in the implementation of the regulations. His quango will rule on exemptions from the statutory right to roam and he can be expected to take a much tougher line with ramblers than with estate owners.

The appointment was wel-comed by countryside groups, but the Ramblers' Association described it as "absolutely stag-

The agency and national park authorities will also be given powers to close land, or "otherwise restrict access", either permanently or temporarily. Land could be closed through breeding seasons for various species, after consultation with nature conservation and heritage bodies, as well as

Another step on Labour's road to free country

By Mark Henderson

THE proposals to transform side announced yesterday by Michael Meacher, the Envi-Minister, are inspired by a cause that has long been close to the heart of the Labour movement. The reforms, while less sweeping than many campaigners had hoped for, will start to fulfil promises to guarantee the right to roam made most forcefully by John Smith, the late Labour leader whose death in 1994 cleared the way for Tony Blair to become Prime Minister. Mr Smith, a "Munro-bagger who walked the Scottish hills to keep fit after his first heart attack, was a passionate advocate of the right to roam, a vice-president of the Ramblers' Association and the latest in a line of socialist politicians who have campaigned for access reform.

The first Labour Prime Minister, Ramsay MacDonald, was among the leading lights of the movement in the 1930s. The cause took off after the Second World War, when Labour politicians placed themselves at the forefront of moves to enshrine public access to the countryside in

Hugh Dalton, the Chancellor, was among those who joined a Ramblers' Association demonstration staged for the press in the Pennines in 1947, the first of its kind. Also present was the young fire-brand MP Barbara Castle, who was later to influence Mr

Smith's views on rambling. Their Government then took the biggest legal strides yet towards the right to roam with the 1949 National Parks and Access to the Countryside Act, which provided for local access agreements with landowners and the new National Parks, with some guaranteed

The fight goes on for rare Pennine view

By PAUL WILKINSON CORRESPONDENT

ON A clear day, they say, you can see Blackpool Tower from the 1.700ft summit of Lad Law in the Pennines.

There are not many clear days in this corner of England, but then again few people ever get the chance to look for the coast 50 miles away. Lad Law lies in the heart of Boulsworth Moor, thousands of acres of disputed territory on the Lancashire-Yorkshire border.

Much of the land is part of . the Savile estate, owned by the 3rd Baron Savile; part is the estate of the Moores football pools family: and the rest is controlled by Yorkshire Water and United Utilities. Access. even to the Pennine Way, which skirts it, is restricted to a handful of rights of way.

More than 40 years ago ramblers persuaded the Lancashire County Council to grant rights of access to 235 acres of moorland, opening up a ridge walk with spectacular views into the Pennine valleys. But the owners appealed to the Government and in 1956 the orders were overturned.

"It has been an ongoing seamless campaign ever since to gain access." said Harry Sculthorpe, a member of the Ramblers' Association from Hebden Bridge. "It is a wonderful place and the public should have access to it."

In the Fifties the water authorities claimed access would pollute the water, but that's not the case now. The land owners just said it would frighten the birds they wanted

Gwen Goddard, from Hebden Bridge, said: "Two hundred years ago this was all open common land ... The Brontes came over from Haworth and many others besides, but now set one foot off the path and you can be threatened with a trespass action."

A spokesman for North West Water, part of United Utilities, said: "People should ening managed access and we have opened up a circuit to the top. But the area does contain a site of special scientific interest, so we have to take care.

Surgeons condemn selling of implants

BY NIGEL HAWKES AND HELEN RUMBELOW

A SURGEON yesterday com-plained that Trilucent, the banned breast implant, had been put on the market in "an unseemly rush".

Norman Waterhouse, a consultant plastic surgeon at Chelsea and Westminster Hospital in London, has removed four Trilucent implants from women who had problems and refuses to use them.

"One of the things that decided me against them is that we had a sample Trilucent implant from the company and it had gone rotten," he said. "After two years it smells like a chip fryer and the surface is shrivelled and wrinkled. That is after being in my drawer, let alone in a woman's chest." Mr Waterhouse and Simon

Kay, a consultant plastic surgeon at St James's University Hospital in Leeds, criticised the way Trilucent had been marketed. Mr Kay said that aggressive marketing was responsible for their use in most of the 5,000 British women who had them. "What upset me was the marketing tactics, using local radio to market Trilucent directly," Mr Kay said. Women came in asking for it by name instead of taking the doctor's advice on what they

"If they are symptom-free, that's fine. They can go to see their surgeon and get some advice if they are wor-ried. If I saw a patient who had these implants put in . . . I would offer to remove them from her if she was worried; that's entirely reasonable."

Trilucent breast implants cost £390 each and a breast augmentation operation costs between £2,500 and £4,000. Removing the implants would cost roughly the same, assuming they were to be replaced with an alternative.

Trilucent was developed at Washington University, St Louis, when fears about silicone implants began but it is now far less popular in Britain than the type it was meant to replace. About a tenth of the implants were fitted by Transing booked in immediately," Ms Bishop said. "But so far none has said that she wants the implant removed."

Mr Waterhouse believes that the side effects of Tribucent are only beginning to be realised. "More than 30 cases of problems is quite a lot out of 5,000 women who have them. It is very early days," he said. What concerns me is the general perception that silicone is bad and everything else is great. This is played on by a lot of advertising. Women come in and say, 'My implants say Bishop, of Transform, said. are so safe I could take them Silicone has been given a out and eat them.' This is a new lease of life in Britain by a very frivolous way to talk report published last year by the Health Department, the

'Safe alternative' left woman with 4 years of pain

A WOMAN who had her silicone breast implants replaced with Trilucent, believing it to be the safe alternative, has experienced four years of crippling pain. Elaine Coomber, 53, had small silicone implants inserted when she was 29 in order to give her breasts some uplift and to look better in clothes. By her late forties they had ruptured, leaving her in great pain and with several health mplications as a result.

Mrs Coomber, of Hextable, Kent, regretted the day she had breast surgery, but because the operation to remove the silicone would also remove most of her remaining breast tissue, she was advised to have another pair of im-

She wanted to avoid the and to minimise the risk of breast cancer now that she was getting older. At the Transform Medical Group they told her that Trilucen was ideal, she said. "They said there was an identification disc in every implant so it could be tracked, and also that it wouldn't obscure Xrays so it allowed earlier tu-

THE only Cabinet minister who could be guaranteed to bring nurses cheering and clapping to their feet dropped in on their annual congress yesterday. Mo Mowlam's appearance was announced at the last moment and she turned in a virtuoso performance that left the 2,500 delegates happy about new Labour.

The Northern Ireland Secretary flew by helicopter to Har-rogate from Dublin, where only two hours earlier she had been signing treaties to bring peace nearer.

For security reasons, her visit, planned at the Labour Party conference last September, was such a well-kept secret that the Royal College of Nursing congress discovered the identity of the "senior government minister" who was to address them only seconds before she appeared. into the hall, who had been grumbling about pay conditions and threatening to boo the Government's speaker. audibly sucked in their breath in amazement and jumped to their feet in delight as the Minister arrived theatrically on stage. The congress, which last year jeered Frank Dob-son, the Health Secretary. gave her a standing ovation. 'It's an honour to be here."

Dr Mowlam said. "Nurses are people who work at the hard face year in and year out. It's crucial we acknowledge you." She asked nurses from Northern Ireland to raise their hands so that they could be cheered. "What they do is what everybody else here does, with the additional problem they can be faced with a tragedy in an inhuman and barbaric form." she said.

Having flattered everyone. it was easy for her to broach the subject that led to Mr Dobson being booed a year earlier: pay. Despite this year's 12 per cent rise for newly qualified nurses and the above-inflation rise of 4.7 per cent for all other grades, most nurses are dissatisfied with the new pay levels. The increases mean that a staff nurse with five years or more experience will receive only £15 a week more, less tax. than the junior nurse she is required to teach. Government recruitment programmes have yet to overcome this disincentive to rejoin the NHS. The college says it has evidence that hospitals are even saving money on the newly qualified nurses by recruiting nursing auxiliaries instead.

Dr Mowlam tackled the pay problem head on and probably not in a way that would be approved by Gordon Brown or Mr Dobson ("We call him 'Dobbo' in the Cabinet." she confided). "I get very frustrated when people say that we talk about modernising the health service and improving the pay of nurses we can't do both. Paying nurses is an investment in patient care in a way that most other things isn't." In deference to Mr Brown, Dr Mowlam eventually added: "We must strike a balance. Pay for nurses must be fair but

mean afforda-ble." she said through the audience's laughter. The fact that the Government had accepted the independent pay review in full proved that it was serious about helping them, she said. She listed other promises. including an end to short-term contracts, a clampdown on violence in hospitals, more prescribing powers for nurses and family-friendly working

The Minister's security, staff whisked her away while dele-gates were still on their feet applauding. Christine Hancock, the college's general secretary, said afterwards: "Mo Mow-lam did a great job in making people feel better about themselves and about nursing. New and old designs on show at Harrogate yesterday

Safety first in revamp of a starchy image

BELTS, buckles and hats are out: pleated skirts, culottes and polo shirts are in. according to new guidelines for nurses' uniforms launched by the Royal College of Nursing yes-

Traditional uniforms restricted movements, nurses said, and made it difficult to handle patients. This in-creased the risk of twisting or dropping them.

The Royal College of Nursing's ideal uniforms, largely developed by students who do not want to spend their work-ing lives in the old-style garments, are designed for easy movement

Dresses have pleats and shoulder vents; modern fabrics that can stretch are preferred to cottons and linens, although Lycra is not suitable be-high enough temperatures to

While allowing unrestricted movement, the clothes are still designed to project a professional image, the RCN said. This is proving one of the more difficult areas to reach agreement on because hospitals aim to promote a corporate identity while the nurses' highest priority is a uniform that helps the public to recognise and trust them. Some patients are intimidated by any uniform, feeling it represents unwelcome authority.

Each hospital decides the uniform that its staff will wear and most nowadays accept casual, often brightly coloured, clothing as both more comfortable and practical than the traditional starched and bormeted style that is still to be found in smaller hospitals, especially in the private sector. The new guidelines make it clear that low necklines and short skirts are inappropriate. Clothes have to be cut so that it is possible for nurses "to adopt any posture, such as bending or reaching, without compromising their dignity or causing offence to the patient". Shoes should be non-slip and provide support. Sandals and clogs are frowned upon. No jewellery should be worn and the best way of giving the uniform a corporate identity is to have badges embroidered on them.

The RCN began campaigning for more comfortable clothing at its congress a year ago. Members hope the designs they have developed will convince the small number of hospitals still using traditional uniforms to come up to date.

Bible rewritten after half a millennium

Royal calligrapher includes ideas from other faiths, write Eve-Ann Prentice and Simon

THE QUEEN'S calligrapher has been commissioned by an American university to produce the first new illuminated Bible for 500 years.

de Bruxelles

Writing with goose quills on the finest vellum, as did medie-val monks, Donald Jackson, 61, will take six years to com-plete the 1,150-page manu-script. He will have a little help from 20th-century technology, however: computers will be used to lay out the pag-es and position each letter before he and his team of calligraphers set quill to calfskin.

The £1.9 million commission from St John's University in Collegeville, Minnesota, is one of the largest undertaken by a calligrapher since the in-vention of printing. As if the challenge was not already big enough, he is also risking the wrath of God-fearing folk of all persuasions by attempting to encompass many faiths and cultures in his illustrations.

Mr Jackson is currently working on a full-page piece for St Matthew's Gospel that shows a Jewish menorah surrounded by Arabic symbols and intertwined spirals suggestive of DNA molecules. The menorah is a powerful Jewish image and I am using it as a graphic designer," he said. "I am likely to be seriously upsetting same people, but this Bi-ble should be inclusive.

No one has hand written the Bible who knows what the world looks like from the sky, who has seen a thermal image of the Earth taken from a satellite — and all this is being reflected in the work."

"The problem is that you are looking at this huge history and it is the first time in 500 years that the Bible has been tackled in this way. The last time was in Germany at the end of the 15th century."

The monks who commissioned the project have seen some of Jackson's early work and, according to their superior, it has provoked intense de-bate. "I am told they have never talked about the Bible, so much," he says.

Mr Jackson says he has abolute artistic freedom, but that the university has an ultimate right of veto. It has so far shown no sign of using it.

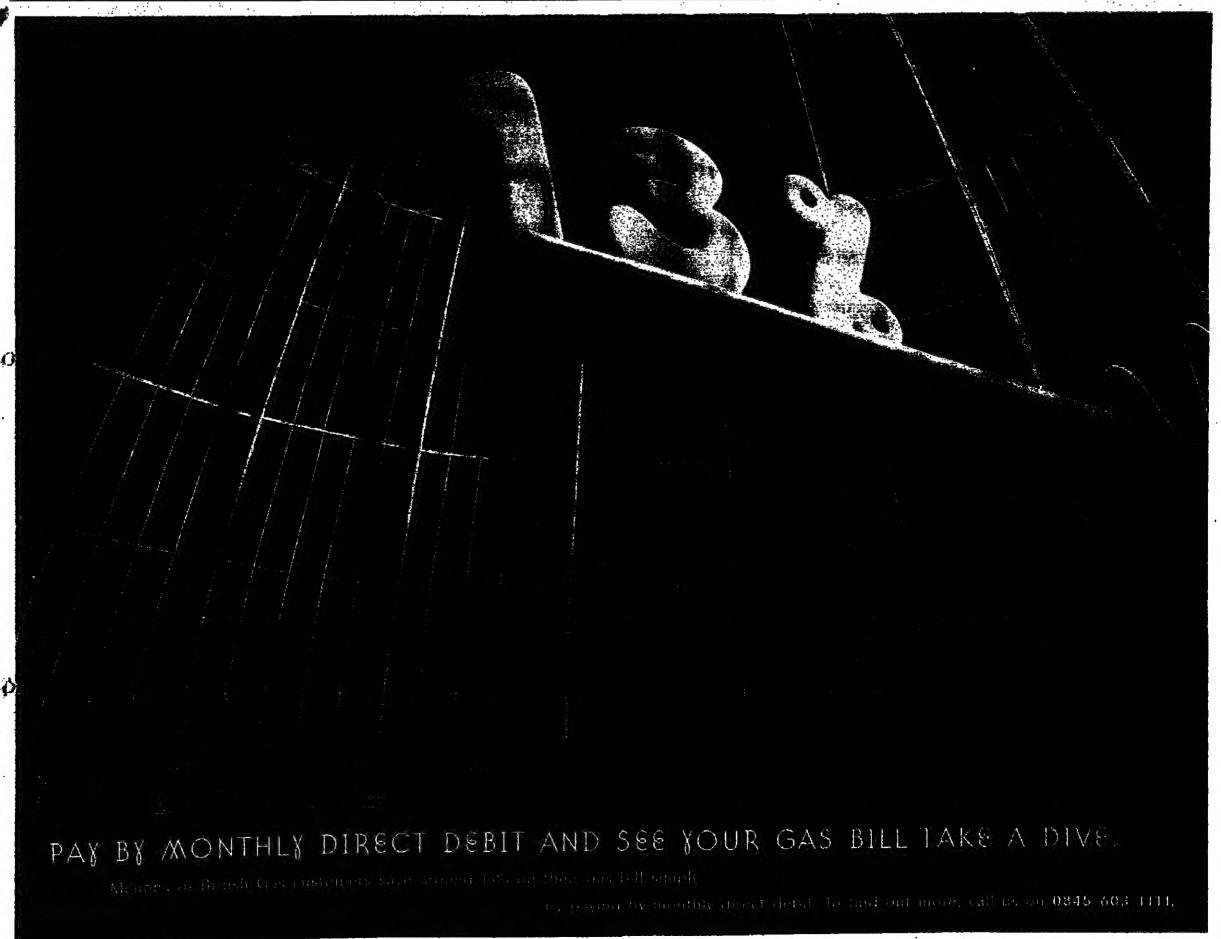

"My job is to do something for people that they would never have thought of asking for but, when they see it, is absokitely everything they could have dreamt of," he said.

Mr Jackson has devised a new lettering style for the work, which will fill seven volumes. The text will be the English-language New Revised Standard Version, though Mr Jackson admits that he feels "a slight tug at the heartstrings that it's not King James". Although Mr Jackson has always loved his art — at the age of 13 he won a scholarship to art school where he specialised in calligraphy, lettering and bookbinding — his every-day handwriting is "beautiful but illegible", according to his wife, Mabel. This, however, is one criticism that fails to perturb him. "Handwriting is to calligraphy what singing in the bath is to appearing solo at Covent Garden," he said.

GERMAINE GREER chose said it was "greatly disappointsolidarity over sales last night when she supported striking workers at the British Library by cancelling the party to be held there to launch her latest book, The Whole Woman.

The decision by Professor Greer, who has been a reader at the library since 1964, cheered more than 100 library assistants who picketed the new building at St Pancras. Central London, in protest at health and safety conditions in the basements. The library is likely to be closed for a week

fessor Greer said; "Authors and publishers alike rely upon the services of library staff for research and editorial purposes or for protection of authors' and publishers' rights. Mis-management at the British Library affects everyone involved in the trade of letters.

When staff are overworked, the systems in place are inappropriate and morale is low, the necessary collaboration between readers and library workers is compromised and distorted. The British Library is the most important collection of books in the world; it is time the British Library management proved itself worthy to be in charge of it." Transworld, her publisher,

The Public and Commercial Services union said that the picketers had had no intention of breaking up the celebra-tions, but that they were glad of Professor Greer's support.
A spokesman said: "We hope this will help us get back to the negotiating table and persuade management to help us find a way forward."

The architect of the library said yesterday that he was "baffled" by the dispute over working conditions in the building's storerooms four floors below ground level. which forced the closure of the reading rooms yesterday. Professor Sir Colin St John Wilson stood by his designs. "It sounds to me like a labour relations exercise rather than anything to do with the fabric of the building," he said. "I've had members of staff say to me that they could not wait to get in there."

According to Sir Colin, when the plans were being prepared the layout was fully discussed with staff representatives and there was, he said, no disagreement whatsoever. There was provision made for a restaurant above ground

ment there for consultation. If people disagreed with ele-ments of the design, a com-pletely restructured version would be made, costed and agreed." The only difference between the British Library's base-ments and most other offices was lack of view, he said. "But there is now a lot of 'deep office, space' where you can be on the 18th floor of a building and you still don't get a view out, especially in the City.

"I would say that if you worked in the British Library you are probably much better off than those working in 'deep Sir Colin also said that he would be surprised and saddened if any serious argument was being made about the design. He knew nothing of a health and safety report mentioned by one worker that reportedly found 37 areas for improvement. He said: "Absolutely nothing has been passed on to me. I just know that the conditions are of a different class from what they were in the British Museum.

MOST of us need full spectrum light, which can only be gained from natural light, to stay psychologically healthy. According to Cary Cooper, Professor at the University of Manchester Institute of Science and Psychology, illness-es such as seasonal affective disorder are most likely to hit those who work in conditions without access to natural

A charge of criminal damage against him was withdrawn after he agreed to be bound over in the sum of £1,000 by magistrates in Croydon, South London.

They were told that Sir Bernard, 66, had kicked the door of the Crippses' silver Mercedes as Mr Cripps, 45, reyersed into his garage along a disputed right of way behind Sir Bernard's bungalow in Pur-ley, South London, last Decemthe leg o mutton sleeves; even the buck-led, square-toed shoes that Catherine Deneuve wore in Belle du Jour. Inevitably a couple of the unfortunate models (including Stella Tennant) had to come out in a reworked see-through shirt. Elbaz might have done better to leave some of them in the archives. Perhaps the best that can be said is that Elbaz managed to make the YSL

School bans PE in effort to boost GCSEs

BY JOHN O'LEARY

A HEAD teacher is defying the law by banning a quarter of his school's GCSE candidates from games lessons in an attempt to improve poor examination results.

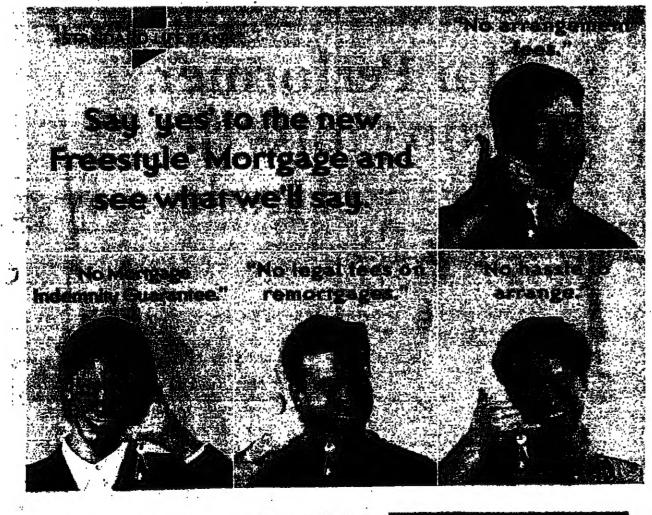

Roger Leighton, the head of Sydney Russell School in Da-genham, East London, has told 70 teenagers that they must attend "enrichment" lessons when the rest of the year have physical education. The school recorded the worst results in the borough last year, only 15 per cent managing five high-grade GCSE passes.

The pupils selected for an extra 100 minutes a week of English, mathematics and science are all expected to do well in next term's examinations. Some have complained about the plan but Mr Leighton is refusing to back down. "I know some students have not been happy about missing PE. They wrote me a letter about this. setting out their points in a sensible and logical way, and I have listened to their arguments. But I am not budging on the basic point."

Mr Leighton is hoping to arrange some sporting activity after school to compensate for the lost lessons. "I am a supporter of PE. We have a leisure centre on site and an excellent PE department. But I am not willing to take any chances at all with this year group, which is why we have made some very tough decisions."

The initiative contravenes the national curriculum, which includes weekly physical education for all pupils. A spokeswoman for the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority said there would be an investigation if the school appeared to be flouting the law.

Kevin Gilliver, the chief executive of the Physical Education Association, said: "Our view would be that it is an awful step to take. We want to be considering the health of the nation. The pupils might be getting out of the habit of being physically active. The head teacher might say that the pu-pils can still do physical education outside of school hours.

Child criminals as young as 10 may be tagged

CHILD offenders as young as ten could be electronically tagged under proposals by the Youth Justice Board to deal with the rising number of young criminals.

Latest estimates presented to Jack Straw show that the number of youngsters aged between ten and 17 held in secure accommodation is forecast to rise from 2,711 last year to 4,275 by 2002-2003, according to a report vesterday.

The board also recommends that young male and female offenders should share the same secure accommodation as long as staffing levels are high and the females are not in a small minority. The board, chaired by Lord Warner, formerly policy adviser to Mr Straw, recommends that tagging could be used for offenders as young as ten to reduce pressure on secure accommodation. Youngsters would be released into the community subject to a curfew monitored by the tags.

Sir David Ramsbotham, the Chief Inspector of Prisons, tested the cell call system at Chelmsford jail and found that no staff responded. In 1994 Christopher Edwards was battered to death in a cell he shared with Richard Linford, a paranoid schizophrenic. Edwards pressed the alarm but it failed to sound because a matchstick had jammed a button and a warning light went unheeded by prison staff.

In an unannounced inspec tion last October. Sir David tested the call system on three separate occasions. "We found it was working but that staff failed to answer any of the cell calls we made. This was total-

Lord Warner said: "Tagging is much more well developed than it was five years ago and it is seen much more as a viable option available to the courts. It is possible to link tagging with human supervision and it is a way of avoiding incarceration."

The report also suggests ex-tending to juvenile offenders the home detention curfew under which inmates serving and of which staff allegedly were ashamed, it should still be the case." The prison, which holds about 460 inmates, was de-clared in need of special managerial attention after Sir David described it as "dreadful" in 1996. His latest report says that no member of staff nor anyone with responsibility for it in the Prison Service should feel proud. He intends to make an emergency reinspection within 12 months. Richard Tilt, the Director-General of the Prison Service. said he was concerned about the failure. Strict instructions

But the board's ambitious plans for child jails holding a total of 100 youngsters in living units of a maximum of eight each contrast sharply with Prison Service plans.

Lord Warner's paper is critical of the service's plans to keep up to 400 youngsters in single establishments and said it doubted they could be successful in helping to prevent re-offending. The Prison Service is planning to develop a sepa-rate juvenile prison estate out of the existing young offender

The report gives no details about costings or whether the Treasury would meet a bill running into hundreds of millions of pounds. However, it publishes figures showing that the privately run Medway Secure training centre which houses 40 teenage offenders in small units costs £2,400 per inmate per week compared with £340 a week in a Prison Service establishment.

Last night penal reform groups gave warning of the difficulties of tagging children as young as ten and of holding male and female teenage offenders together.

Harry Fletcher, assistant general secretary of the National Association of Proba-tion Officers, said: Tagging ten year olds is unlikely to work because their behaviour is a consequence of ill-disciplined parents and it will be the parents who will have to impose discipline to police the

He said he hoped that sex education as well as dealing with offending behaviour would be on the curriculum in units holding male and female teenage offenders.

Robertson comes to defence of Europe

WHENEVER the subject of European defence is raised, alarm bells start ringing in Washington and among sceptics. Is Nato being under-mined? Are national identities to be submerged in a European Army? Will British troops be sent into action on the orders of foreigners? Definitely not says George Robertson, the Defence Secretary, who is trying to put substance behind the idea. He notes that it was Michael Portillo, his Tory predecessor, who helped to launch the European Security and Defence Identity at a summit in Berlin in 1995. Discussions will intensify this year. starting in London this week and at the Nato summit in Washington next month.

Mr Robertson himself has unquestioned Atlanticist and European credentials - fighting unilateralism in the early 1980s and taking over as Labour's European spokesman in 1984 when the party was still committed to withdrawal.

Nonetheless, he admits that the Franco-British declaration at St Malo three months ago that Europe "must have the capacity for autonomous action, backed up by credible forces did generate fears in Washington about a separate European caucus. An immediate campaign was mounted to reassure the Americans that the aim was to back up Nato in situations where they might not wish to commit ground troops.

Peter Riddell on the minister deploying all his skills to work out the future of 'credible European armed forces'

The Americans, Mr Robertson argues, "have wanted burden-sharing with the Europe-ans contributing more, but, at the same time, they have been worried that we Europeans are undermining our commitment to Nato." The US is "uncomfortable as the only superpower". The latest initiative originates both in developments in the EU on foreign and security policy (notably the ap pointment this high representative" responsible

The strengthening of Euro-pean defence is also a way in which the Blair Government can demonstrate its broader commitment to the EU even though it is outside the single currency. Mr Robertson and Robin Cook are discussing the issues with Menzies Campbell, the Liberal Democrats' foreign and defence spokesman. The two parties largely agree on European security and the initiative is partly to show, in Mr Robertson's words, how far the Tories have retreated from the Portillo position". But as the close British-American co-operation over Iraq shows, the Blair Government is far from committing itself wholly to a European approach. The transatlantic balancing act will continue.

War crimes threat for Milosevic

Blair singles out Yugoslav leader for trial if Kosovo atrocities are repeated, Michael Evans writes

TONY BLAIR gave a clear warning yesterday to Presi-dent Milosevic, the Yugoslav leader, that if there are any more atrocities in Kosovo he will be held accountable for .suspected war crimes.

The warning was the first ime that a Western leader has deliberately singled out Mr Milosevic for possible war trimes charges if the Serb forces under his command committed further atrocities.

Unlike Radovan Karadzic, the former Bosnian Serb President who was indicted - but not yet arrested — for war crimes committed during the conflict in Bosnia, Mr Milose vic has not been included on the wanted list of suspected war criminals. However, Mr Blair said that, in the crucial period leading up to renewed peace negoti-ations in France, "President Milosevic and his commanders must . . . understand that Nato will not stand by in the face of renewed repression in Kosovo or atrocities like the one we witnessed at Racak", where 45 ethnic Albanians were slaughtered. The Prime Minister added: "Nor can the International War Crimes Tribunal in The Hague."

After the Racak massacre, Belgrade refused to allow Louise Arbour, the chief investigafor at the tribunal, to enter Kosovo to begin inquiries.

Mr Blair's spokesman said that the Prime Minister had deliberately named the Yugoslav leader in his reference to war crimes in Kosovo to put maximum pressure on him to keep his forces under control. Although Mr Milosevic has voiced defiance over Nato's threats to launch airstrikes, any move to indict him as a war criminal could pose a big threar to his political future.

Speaking at a conference at the Royal United Services Institute in London to mark next month's 50th anniversary of Nato, Mr Blair said the alliance was determined not to repeat the early mistakes in Bosnia when the United Nations was carrying out humanitarian assistance, while the fighting was going on.

"In Kosovo... we will not allow war to devastate a part of our continent, bringing untold death, suffering and homelessness," he said, Nor would Nato accept "prevarication" at the peace talks which are set to begin next Monday at Evreux in Normandy. "No side can be allowed to obstruct the proc-

As he was speaking, Mr Milosevic issued a statement in Belgrade that he would never approve the deployment of any foreign troops in Kosovo to implement a peace deal. However, Mr Blair said:

The Balkans are littered with agreements that are signed but not implemented. To make an agreement work, to bring stability in Kosovo, an interna-tional force is an indispensable element. Only Nato is equipped to lead it."

Underlining the problems that still remain in Bosnia, the

to win allies in banana conflict

BY CHARLES BREMNER

EUROPE won little sympathy when it took its feud with Washington over bananas before the world's top trade body yesterday, claiming that US sanctions were a declaration of war against all its members.

Irritation over the conduct of the US and European Union was manifest at the World Trade Organisation meeting in Geneva, which was called by the EU to protest against punitive US sanctions that could cost more than £320 million in exports this year.

Erroys at the 133-nation grouping voiced dismay over the quarrel that many see as a threat to efforts to liberalise global trade.

Renato Ruggiero, the Director-General of the trade organisation, urged Washington and Brussels to settle the dispute

We seek a solution to a problem firstly by mutual agreement and not by impos-ing rulings on either side," Signor Ruggiero said. "I invite again both parties to renew

The EU had been hoping to win moral support from the trade organisation's council against what it sees as a flagrant breach of the group's rules. Roderick Abbott, the EU envoy to the WTO, said the Americans were "declaring war on... WTO members whose compliance it decides is inadequate".

The European case is that the Americans failed to wait for the outcome of separate trade organisation arbitration before imposing a 100 per cent levy on a wide list of imported goods, ranging from Scottish cashmere to Spanish leather.

Britain is the biggest target of the American decision to retaliate against EU rules that favour banana imports from the Caribbean and Africa over those from Latin America.

Iranian leader targets the Pope in European charm offensive

Khatami: capitalising on

IN THE face of American dismay and protests from Iranian exiles. President Khatami will today become the first Iranian leader to travel to Europe since the Islamic revolution of 1979 when he makes an official visit to Rome and the Vatican. He will meet the Pope on Thurs-day, and will follow the Rome visit with talks in Paris next month. Diplomats said President Khatami's European "charm offensive" was intended to capitalise on his reputation as a moderate, further enhanced by the success of reformers in Tehran and key towns such as Isfahan, Tabriz and Shiraz in the recent municipal elections. Iranian officials said the President wanted to engage in a "dialogue of civilisaKhatami's attempt at dialogue angers US

But Tehran clearly also hopes the trip will widen the gap between Europe and America on the branding of Iran as a pariah state, with European companies increasingly willing to defy the American-led embar-go. Last week ENI of Italy and Elf-Aquitaine of France signed a $1 bil-lion (£660 million) deal to develop the offshore Doroud oilfield in the Gulf, despite Washinton's threat of

A State Department spokesman said Washington was "disappointed and concerned" by the oil deal. The Italian press quoted Kamal Kharrazi, the Foreign Minister, as saying he none the less hoped US oil companies would also getter to invest in nies would also return to invest in Iran, which has been hit by the worldwide fall in oil prices. Mr Kharrazi called on America to " face reality " and drop its embargo, imposed in 1995 because of Iran's alleged involvement in terrorism. Lamberto Dini, the Italian Foreign Minister, who visited Tehran a year ago, said he had been assured by President Khatami that Iran "does not support terrorism, either by states or by individual groups. Writing in La Repubblica, Signor Dini said the recent elections marked "a turning point in Iranian

Italian officials said Massimo D'Alema, the Prime Minister, and Signor Dini would press Mr Khatami "behind the scenes" over Iran's human rights record, and would raise "continuing Western concern" over the death threats against Salman Rushdie, the British writer. But Italian opposition MPs said

President Khatami was merely the "acceptable face" of an authoritarian regime. Police said they expected 4,000 Iranian exiles from opposition groups to protest against the visit on the streets of Rome today.

While Britain has supported the American line, Italy and France have been in the forefront of links with Tehran, with Signor Dini going to Tehran last year barely a week after the EU had lifted its ban on ministerial visits to Iran. The ban was imposed in 1997 after a German court ruled that Tehran was behind the murder of three Kurdish dissidents in Berlin in 1992.

Signor Dini said he had found Mr Khalami a. "cultured man with a clear vision of the way forward, who seeks dialogue both with Europe and the US". He said Iran's arsenal was "not large enough to cause undue alarm".

Russia is likely to win another IMF handout

DESPITE the continuing saga of the missing millions from Russia's Central Bank and the Government's abject failure to come up with a coherent economic programme, the International Monetary Fund is expected to pour more money into the country's devastated

Western economists believe that a deal is likely to be completed when Yevgeni Primakoy, the Prime Minister and the man tipped to be the next President, visits Washington at the end of the month.

An IMF mission that is expected in Moscow this week to continue negotiations with the Government finds itself faced with a tough choice.

It could recommend that the next instalment of its $17.6 billion (£10.8 billion) loan to Russia be paid. This would disregard allegations of large-scale theft by the Central Bank via Pimaco, its offshore management company, and the devastating impact the last IMF stabilisation loan had in propping up an untenable currency. The rouble collapsed on August 17 last year, leaving the Russian banks to rush their depositors' money offshore, nev-

Alternatively, the IMF could refuse to pump any more money into a country that in only six months has become an economic disaster zone. The likely result would be that Russia would default on repayments of the $18 billion already pro-vided by the IMF. So far Russia has kept up to date on its debt service, repaying $5 billion over the past five months. But without the next loan instalment. Russia would have to print itself into hyperinflation to meet its foreign debt obligations.

Politically, I don't see how the IMF can refuse them the money. They have got no choice," said one senior Western economist in Moscow. "The Fimaco scandal has been blown out of all proportion. and even if Central Bank people were lining their own pockets a bit, it at least means they weren't on the payrolls of the big [commercial] bankers." Yuri Skuratov, the Chief Prosecutor, has accused the Central Bank and Fitnaco. which was technically owned by the bank, of possible illegal activity. Although no proof has emerged that actual theft took place, records do appear to have been doctored to exclude certain deals. Viktor Gerashchenko, the Central Bank Chairman, has employed PriceWaterhouseCoopers to conduct a special audit of Fimaco, although this will not be the first time Western auditors have been called in.

A deal between Russia and the IMF is now desperately needed by both sides, especially since Mr Primakov, who promised before he became Prime Minister that nobody should expect quick results from him, has been dragging out negotiations on economic restructuring for so long.

President Yeltsin is known to be irritated by Mr Primakov's failure to strike a deal and Moscow is buzzing with rumours that the Prime Minister is about to be sacked.

However, much though Mr Yeltsin might like to get rid of the increasingly powerful and popular Mr Primakov, such a move would probably result in his own power being challenged by the State Duma.
It is more likely, therefore, that Yuri Maslyukov, the First Deputy Prime Minister and the Government's chief negotiator with the IMF, or Gennadi Kulik, his deputy, will be sacri-

Israeli army post faces attack from archaeologists

ARCHAEOLOGISTS have discovered the excellently preserved remains of a Byzantine church named after John the Baptist, but are un-able to complete their excavation because an Israeli army position is directly on top of the site.

France tries six absent Libyans for bombings

FROM ADAM SAGE

A FRENCH court yesterday, began hearing in absentia a case against six Libyan secret service agents accused of kill-ing 170 people in a terrorist attack on a French civilian airliner in 1989. One of those accused. Abdallah Senoussi, 47, is the broth-er-in-law of Colonel Muammar Gaddafi; the Libyan leader, who has refused to extradite the defendants. But he has indicated that he might he will-ing to jail the men in Libya if they were found guilty.

At the same time Colonel Gaddafi is waging an appar-ently successful diplomatic offensive to persuade the French Government to push for a lift-ing of the 1992 United Nations embargo imposed on Libya for its refusal to co-operate with investigations into the Lockerbie plane bombing and the attack on the French DC10.

In the French bombing a UTA flight from Brazzaville. Congo, to Paris via Ndjamena in Chad exploded over the desert in Niger, killing all 156 passengers and 14 crew members on September 19, 1989. Bonnie Pugh, the wife of the US Ambaassador to Chad. and Mahamat Soumahila, Chad's Planning Minister, were on board. French detectives, helped by the FBL discovered fragments of a timing device bought in Germany by Libyan agents. They also traced a member of the Congolese opposition movement, Bernard Yanga, who said one of his colleagues had unwittingly carried a suitcase that contained the explo-sives onto the plane. Mr Yanga said the attack was to avenge French support for Chad in its war with Libya in the 1980s. Mr Senoussi, head of international operations of the Libyan secret services, is being tried along with Colonel Issa Shibani, head of technical services, Abdallah Elazragh, 64, head of the Brazzaville bureau, and three of his subordi-

Schröder, angered by

Mobile message falls on deaf ears

By ROGER BOYES

THE German Chancellor was said to be upset yesterday by the unauthorised use of his photograph in an advertisement for mobile telephones.

"I must tell Oskar," Gerhard Schröder says in the advertisement, in a reference to Oskar Lafontaine, his Finance Minister.

The text is advertising the message that rates of Mobilcom telephone company are cheaper than those of the market leader, Deutsche Telekom, Photographs of Herr Schröder talking into the telephone made the news yesterday and at the weekend.

Since the Social Democrat-Green Government came to power in autumn. German advertisers have been having a field day pirating photographs of politicians. A favourite tar-get is Joschka Fischer, the Foreign Minister. He has authorised only one out of dozens of advertisements featuring his face, but even this relatively modest plug for an encyclopaedia has led to a hail of criticism. Axivertisers argue that politicians' images are in the public domain. Politi-

crease their public recognition, now believe their images are being devalued.

Danger man of Bonn dogged by EU rumour

OSKAR LAFONTAINE, the German Finance Minister once dubbed the "most dangerous man" in Europe, was again tipped yesterday to be the next President of the European Union.

When the rumour first surfaced, the Jesuit-educated Herr Lafontaine joked that he was running for Pope, not for the European Commission, but the denials last night were less jovial.

The reason is clear: Herr Lafontaine believes confidents of Gerhard Schröder, the Chancellor, are trying to clip his wings. A move to Brussels, indeed any suggestion he is less than fully committed to his two jobs as Finance Minister and Social Democratic Party chairman, is interpreted as a sign of weakness. Herr Lafontaine has come under criticism for his halfhearted tax reforms, which do little to relieve ordinary income-tax payers but seem to penalise big companies which are threatening to switch their investment to other EU countries, including Britain. He is also being blamed for the con-fused state of the Social Democratic Party. For the first time since the election last autumn, the Social Democrat-Green coalition no longer enjoys a majority in opinion polls.

Herr Latontaine started his stint in power by shocking his European allies, calling for tax harmonisation, tighter political and economic integration and target exchange-rate

A plot to push Lafontaine into

zones. At home he has shocked Germans by suggesting—con-trary to pledges made by Herr Schröder—that there could be a working alliance with the previously shunned ex-com-munists, the Party of Demo-cratic Socialists. Yet the pressure of getting a deal on the reform of European finances — the present deadline is the European summit on March 25

- trussed him up. So, too, has the dwindling importance of the Social Democratic Party in the day-to-day process of government. The power of the par-ty chairmanship has shrunk accordingly.

The result is a vacuum at the heart of Bonn politics between the Chancellor who, like Helmut Kohl before him, is trying to create a presidential style of government, and the technically most important but invariably absent Cabinet The Chancellor's chief aide.

Bodo Hombach, has called for more discipline in the Government and is trying to pull back some of the authority that has trickled away over the past

covert briefings against troublesome ministers

Hence the new life given to the old rumour - carried as a front-page story in La Stampa of Turin - that Herr Lafon-taine is destined to succeed Jacques Santer in Brussels. The truth is that the Chancelfor almost certainly favours the former Prime Minister of Italy, Romano Prodi.

Signor Prodi was recently seen in Bonn dining with Herr Kohl. Both men were later invited for a second dinner with Herr Schröder. Herr Lafontaine may be down but he is not out. His chief weakness is the poor state of the economy and no amount of lobbying for lower interest rates can make up for the fact that unemployment has been climbing steeply since the Social Democrats came to power.

The responsibility for the flagging economy is shared with the Chancellor, however. The German Chamber of Commeme forecasts growth this year of barely 1.5 per cent. Only a few months ago double that rate was predicted.

In January, producer prices dropped by 2.3 per cent com-pared to January 1998, the steepest fall for years. With the euro sliding rapidly against the dollar and investment switching abroad, German economists are talking openly of a looming recession.

Cook will ask Nigeria to stay in peace role

By Michael Binyon, diplomatic editor

ROBIN COOK, the Foreign Secretary, arrived in Nigeria last night for four days of intensive talks to keep West African forces in Sierra Leone and to map out the ruined country's political and economic recovery.

He will also hold a summit with his French counterpart to try to heal the wounds of nearly a century of Anglo-French rivalry in Africa, and they will join forces to prevent the fighting in the Democratic Republic of Congo from destabilising surrounding countries. In Nigeria he will urge Olusegun Obasanjo, the President-elect, not to pull troops out of Sierra Leone, where they form the backbone of the Ecomog intervention force that has been fighting the rebels. There are strong fears in London that Nigeria will tire of its heavy losses and costly operations to prop up the tottering Government of President Kabbah, and may withdraw. But this would hand victory to the brutal Revolutionary United Front, which last month almost overran Freetown, the capital. Mr Cook will promise Presi-dent Kabbah maximum support to keep him in power and help to rebuild his country. Last week the Government announced £10 million in emergency aid - mostly for equipment, communications and military logistics and to help to demilitarise captured rebel forces. That is on top of £4 million already committed, making Sierra Leone one of the biggest recipients of British emergency aid over the past year.

Nigeria's presidential elections are seen as a vital step in bringing stability to West Africa, and Mr Cook will congratulate Mr Obusanjo on his vic-tory and General Abdulsalami Abubakar, outgoing head of the military Government, for allowing civilian rule. Nigeria was yesterday prom-ised a rapid return to full Commonwealth membership. To mark Commonwealth Day, Chief Emeka Anyaoku, the Secretary-General - and a former Nigerian Foreign Minister - said that he expected Nigeria to be readmitted on May 29, the day the civilian Government takes office. Mr Cook's visit was yester day impraged by that of the Rev. Jesse Jackson, President Clinton's special envoy, who arrived with messages of congratulation from the White House for both Nigerian lead-ers. Mr Jackson will visit the volatile Delta region. Later Mr Cook will make a joint visit with Hubert Védrine, France's Foreign Minister, to Ghana and Ivory Coast They will call a meeting of the region's British and French ambassadors to proclaim a new era of Franco-British cooperation in a continent where colonial rivalry has pitted anglophone and francophone Africans against each other.

That rivalry was bitterly underlined in Uganda last week when Rwandan Hutu extremists who murdered eight English-speaking tourists first separated, then left unharmed. those who spoke French.

Elders bury heads in sand as French diners hop into Australia habit

IN PARIS

KANGAROO fillets and ostrich steaks are becoming popular on Gallie dinner tables as younger French generations ignore their elders and embrace globalisation.

Figures published yesterday by the Australian Trade Commission in Paris said France had, contrary, to its chauvinistic reputation, inported more kangaroo and ostrich meat than any other European country last year. Australian kanga-roo farms have been unable to make serious inroads in countries with strong animal rights lobbies such as Britain, but have found that the carnivorous French provide them with a boom market.

French importers have also asked for a licence to sell carnel and crocodile meat, the magazine, Marianne, reported yesterday. The success of Sir Terence Conran's Parisian restaurant, Alcazar, which opened last year, is another sign that modern French are willing to accept foreign products. "It is completely wrong to think that the French are nationalistic." said Anne Borgo, marketing manager with the Australian Trade Commission in the French capital.

The young are very open-minded."
Sales of Australian wine in France were rising by 60 per cent a year to reach 500,000 littes in 1998. Among the over-40s, these figures are likely to provoke collective apoplexy. Most would rather live on Permer than be forced to touch a drop of non-French wine. Spanish Rioja is seen as dangerously exotic. while Australian products are treated as a bad joke. Australia is second only to Britain on France's hate list, but climbed to first place for a few months in 1995 as the two countries fell out over French nuclear tests in the South Pacific. Kati Jahromi, Edneation Director at the Trade Commission, said older French generations continued to shape French policy and the country's image abroad.

"But the under-40s are completely different and they just do their own thing." Younger French people ate almost all the 900 tonnes of ostrich meat and 600 ionnes of kangaroo meat imported from Australia in 1998, and are likely to eat more this year, according to the commission. French farmers have jumped on the bandwagon and established several ostrich farms in western France, including one, near Nantes, with 6,000 birds.

All the big French supermarkets sell ostrich for up to Fr210 (about £23) a kilo, and most sell kangaroo fillets for about Fr70 a kilo. "We tested kangaroo meat on 6.000 people In France last year," said Mme Borgo, "and 100 per cent said they liked it. It is fat free and tastes very similar to beef." Australian attempts to sell kangaroo in Britain have foundcred because of misgivings about eating such an apparently cuddly animal. But there are no such problems in France, which has a long tradition of consuming horsemeat.

Family sues 'Killers' director

Relatives say woman was shot in robbery inspired by crime film, writes Damian Whitworth in Washington

THE family of a Louisiana woman who say she was shot in a robbery inspired by Oliv-er Stone's film Natural Born Killers have been given permission to sue the director.

The Supreme Court yester-day gave the go-ahead for the action by agreeing with a Louisiana Appeal Court rul-ing that the film was not protected by constitutional freespeech guarantees because it allegedly incited "imminent lawless activity". The 1994 movie, directed by Stone and starring Woody Harrelson and Juliette Lewis, portrayed a young couple who go on a crime spree, killing numerous people.

The lawsuit has been filed in the name of Patsy Ann Byers who was shot and paralysed on March 8, 1995, at a convenience store in Ponchatoula - her husband. Lonnie Wayne Byers, and their three children, Ladonna, an adult, Jacob, 13, and Joshua, four. The family are seeking damages against the film's directors. producers and distributors.

It is alleged that Sarah Edmondson, i8, the daughter of an Oklahoma judge and the niece of Oklahoma's attorneygeneral, and her accomplice, Benjamin Darrus, repeatedly watched a videotape of the film and then went on the rampage, murdering a Mississippi businessman and attempting to kill Mrs Byers.

It is claimed that Stone, Time Warner Inc. and others involved in directing, producing or distributing the film should be held responsible and pay damages because they made a film that intended to make people violent.

Theodore Olson, for the Hollywood defendants, had appealed to the Supreme Court io overturn the Louisiana ruling. The attorney said that decision created "a dangerously low threshold for damage suits against artists for the criminal conduct of alleged imitators" and represented a "drastic departure" from First Amendment law. He added that the decision 'exposed writers, publishers. broadcasters and motion pic-ture producers to costly ... litigation" whenever it can be al-

Artists will have no choice. he said, but to censor violent or particularly graphic depic-tions that might lead to imitation and costly jury verdicts. Supporting the appeal were several media-related organisations, including groups representing television networks, booksellers, authors, publishers, film directors and the film industry. They urged the Supreme Court to reverse the ruling "to safeguard important constitutional rights".

But anomeys for the family of Mrs Byers, who died of cancer last year at 38, opposed the appeal, saying the case was "literally in its embryonic stages" and should proceed. They said that the Hollywood defendants had exaggerated the ruling's consequences, and could reassert First Amendment claims after the gathering of evidence. The Supreme Court let the Louisiana ruling stand without comment.

Darrus and Edmondson received 35-year jail sentences for shooting Mrs Byers in the neck and Darrus was given life for the murder of William Savage, the businessman.

Jakarta 'causing famine' in Timor

Sydney: East Timor is being kept short of food by Indonesia to pressure the dissident territory to abandon thoughts of indonesia to the state of the independence, José Ramos-Horta. Timorese winner of the Nobel Peace Prize, said yesterday (David Watts writes).

Speaking in Canberra after meeting 21 Western diplomats reviewing the situation in the former Portuguese territory—invaded by Indonesia in 1975 and annexed the following year - he argued that a United Nations presence was needed. There is an impending humanitarian catastrophe in the next few weeks if no initiative, no actions, are taken right now to provide supplies of food, medicine and essential commodities to East Timor," Mr Ramos-Horta said.

Poll rivals killed

Johannesburg: The threat of violence as campaigning intensi-fies for South Africa's June 2 general election escalated after two officials of rival parties were murdered near Cape Town (Ray Kennedy writes). Zwelinzima Hlazo, an African Nation-al Congress local councillor, was shot in the street and Mnoedisi Mpongwana, a United Democratic Movement branch secretary, was killed at his home.

Warning for Chechnya

Moscow: In a direct threat to Chechnya, Sergei Stepashin, the Russian Interior Minister, gave warning that action would be taken if Major-General Gennadi Shpigun, Mr Stepashin's representative in the breakaway republic who was kidnapped on Friday, was not released (Anna Blundy writes). Mr Stepashin's comments came as Russia evacuated all of its remaining personnel from its headquarters in Grozny.

Schwarzenegger row

Tokyo: Shozaburo Nakamura, the Justice Minister, resigned over claims that he allowed Arnold Schwarzenegger into Japan without a passport (Robert Whymant writes). The American actor was permitted to enter, though he told officials he had lost his passport and filled out a form. Mr Nakamura admitted he retained the form instead of forwarding it to the authorities, but denied taking it home as a souvenir.

Fresco thief repents

Rome: A tourist from Brazil who stole a fragment of medieval fresco from the Basilica of St Francis in Assisi after the earthquake a year and a half ago has returned it "with apologies" (Richard Owen writes). Il Messaggero said the woman had been tormented by guilt. Father Giulio Berrettoni, the basilica's custodian, said the Franciscan order at the medieval complex would not press charges.

Divine vengeance

Nairobi: A thief who stole the collection at a Sunday service in All Saints Cathedral, Nairobi, was killed by a bus when he fied with his loot, the Kenya Times reported. The middle aged man, who had attended the service, ran straight into the path of the bus when he fied after members of the congregation spotted him putting the money into his pockets. (Reuters)

Chinese warm to the theme of Mickey Mao

FROM JAMES PRINGLE IN BELLING

WHEN you already have Kentucky Fried Chicken. McDonald's and Coca-Cola, why not Mickey Mao? Shanghai's Mayor, Xu Kuangdi, said yesterday that the Chinese port city was in the running, like Hong Kong, to build a Disney theme park. "If you build one in Hong Kong and another in Shanghai, it is not too much." Mr Xu told delegates to China's parliament, the National People's Congress, holding its annual session in Beijing. Hong Kong announced last week that it was talking to the Walt Disney Company.

Whether it is Hong Kong or Shanghai, we are extremely happy because China needs a Disney park," Mr Xu said.

Using a metaphor easily appreciated in football-mad China, Mr Xu, whose city was once a bastion of the Cultural Revolution that banned all forms of popular entertainment, added: "Whoever scores the goal, it is the Chinese team."

It seems all is forgiven by Chinese leaders who were angry with Disney over its 1997 film Kundun, based on the life of the Dalai Lama, the exiled spiritual leader of Tibet who is seeking autonomy for his Himalayan

Beijing's reaction threatened Disney's business interests in China, but the company now seems to have repaired the damage. Michael Eisner, Disney's chairman and chief executive officer, visited Beijing last year

Mr Eisner said that he was struck by the business opportunities and that he was confident that the Chinese people loved Mickey Mouse. He indicated Disney was considering major investment in China.

The possibility of a Disney theme park in Hong Kong at a time of economic misery and high unemployment has cheered the markets in the former British territory. However, Hong Kong has indicated that, while it welcomed a possible deal with Disney, there were limits to the concessions it would make to achieve one. A decision on the theme park is expected by June 30.

Mr Xu said that Shanghai had several advantages over its rival in the south, namely greater land resources and a population of 12 million com-pared with Hong Kong's 6.7 million.

Clinton takes aid pledge to Central America

By DAVID ADAMS LATTN AMERICA CORRESPONDENT

PRESIDENT CLINTON arrived in Nicaragua yesterday at the start of a four-day tour of Central America where he will inspect progress made in the recovery from last year's devastating Hurricane Mitch, as well as offering continued US economic

Mr Clinton, who is often at his best overseas, may have been looking forward to a break from Washington. But even in Central America it may be hard for him to escape the cloud of Monica Lewinsky. Mr Clinton's Central American trip had to be postponed last month because of the impeachment hearings in Congress.

Since then the problems have not gone away. The White House had hoped to win quick approval last week for a $1 billion (£614 million) emergency aid package for concessions to Central America is also destined for the long haul.

Central American governments are warning the US that, if it does not take swift action, it will be hit by a wave of refugees from the region, where unemployment is at record levels due to the economic damage to agriculture and industry inflicted by Mitch. Many "wetbacks" are already entering the US across the border with Mexico and in January this year the number of illegal immigrants from Central America caught entering the US rose 150 per cent. Hurricane Mitch, which struck Central America in late October and early November, is considered one of the worst natural disasters recorded in the Western hemisphere. The storm meandered along the north coast of Honduras for several days, the region, only to see it get bogged down in budget debates in Congress. Another Administration proposal to expand trade fore unleashing mudslides in Nicaragua and, to a lesser extent, in El Salvador and Guatemala. More than 9,000 people died - 5,000 in Honduras alone - thousands are missing and the storm caused billions of pounds in damage. In Nicaragua and Honduras, thousands of people remain without housing.

The United Nations World Food Organization has given a warning that Honduras does not have enough grain to feed the nation, and it predicts a food crisis this spring. The rainy season starts in May and could trigger new flooding and landslides in areas made hazardous by Mitch.

"It's a difficult moment right now," said Sally O'Neill, who directs the Honduras office of Trocaire, the official aid organisation of the Irish Roman Catholic Church. "People are losing their patience. Immediately after the hurricane, there were tremendous pledges of aid. But few have been converted into cash."

US officials hope to launch a second recovery phase of hurricane relief with an ambitious $956 million aid package that they describe as "the largest relief operation ever directed at any natural disaster in our nation's history".

Most observers have praised the plan

but worry about delays in Congress. "Huge talent has been put into this," said Bob White, a former US ambassador in Central America, and director of the Washingtonbased Centre for International Policy.

"In the 1980s Congress couldn't wait to dump billions of dollars into Central America to kill people. Now they can't come up with a few million to help these poor people out of the worst natural disaster in the Western hemisphere. it's outrageous," Mr White said.

US to check 'food chain' drugs

By Damian Whitworth

THE US Food and Drug Administration is launching a major review of the feeding of antibiotics to livestock on a routine basis amid increasing fears that the controversial practice could be exposing human beings to danger.

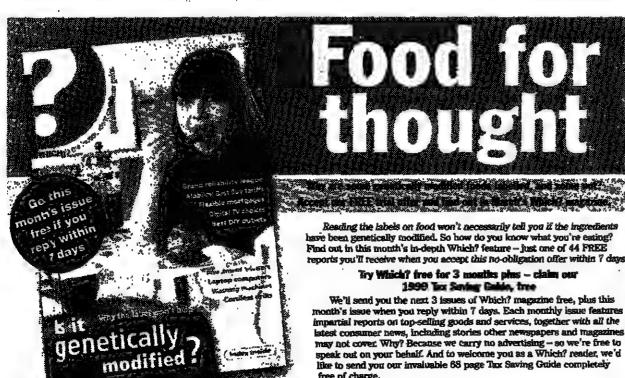

The administration, in a move to try to prevent the development of strains of bacteria that are resistant to antibotics, is considering guidelines that will force the manufacturers to introduce new tests for livestock drugs. Those that will come under particular examination are antibiotics used for both animals and human beings. In Europe, antibiotics used to treat human beings cannot be given to animals to cause growth, but in America there is much COSSOVET.

Now there are calls to follow the example of Europe. Some scientists claim that feeding the antibiotics to animals at low levels over a long time fosters resistance that can be passed on to human beings. It is suggested that the resistant bacteria can be picked up either by handling meat or eating it.

Dr Stephen Sundiof, director of the centre for veterinary medicine at the FDA, told The New York Times: "Resistance has always been a problem in human medicine. The way we had avoided any catastrophic events was to continue to develop new products.

"But it became apparent in the 1990s that there weren't any new classes of antibiotics at the stage of development where they would be approved and available in the near future, and there was great concern that if resistance developed to this last class of drugs, it could have very bad ramifications for the career, helpful husband and an intelligent lively four-year-old son. Yet what should be the prime of her life is, at 45, completely ruined by the relentless misery of an unexpected early menopause. "I'm exhausted, I can't sleep. I suffer from hot flushes and carpal tunnel syndrome - pain and numbness in the arm which means I can't hold anything for more than 20 seconds, my legs and hips ache constantly and the hormones are raging.

What older mums are not told

"I knew, being an older mother, that I wouldn't be much good on the football pitch, but I thought I would make it up intellectually. Now when Joshua asks me to read Teddy Robinson for the fifth time I burst into tears. He looks up over his Fruitibix and I'm having a hot flush and he asks me what's wrong.
It's unbearable having to

I am taking HRT, but feel I have no choice. There is breast cancer in the family so I think I wouldn't normally have risked it, but I had to do something to try and be there for Josh.

"My reaction to any problem is to read as much as possible about it. Yet in all the books on menopause, there is nothing about menopause and toddlers. It makes me feel like an outsider. All the literature talks about 'now your children hristina Newell has are leaving home' - the emptynest syndrome which those middle life years have always been associated with.

"No one tells you how to cope when you're in floods of tears, your limbs are so heavy you cannot lift your arm and there's a bright-eyed little toddier pulling at your sleeve.

"I know there have always been women having children right up to the menopause, but they were the last children and there were probably older siblings around to help. Nor were women pursuing careers in the same ambitious, all-consuming way in those days."

Newell is convinced that there is a link between Nineties careers and early menopause, leaving many women in the same position. "Women are having children later because of their careers. But these same, stressful careers which make them put off the children. I'm sure, are bringing an early menopause, too.

I have several friends also going through an early menopause - a 38-year-old mother of three and another of 45. Is it just coincidence that they are also my most high-achieving Bridget Miles agrees with

Newell. Mother of three children under six and equally high-flying, she, too, is menopausal long before she expected it. "Because I was working I kept putting off children, then suddenly found myself heading rapidly for 40. I had two daughters in quick succession at 38 and 39, felt fine, got re-established in my career, then had an accidental pregnancy at 43 and begged another ca-

"From a fit, lively, intellectually fulfilled older mother I've turned into a drugged-out zombie, swallowing every antidepressant and menopause treatment available. I can barely make myself a cup of rea and I sit there sweating, aching and bursting into tears practically every time I look at these lovely children."

Like Newell she also feels that she is alone. "I can't talk to anyone: having children later in life is meant to make you 'young', so that's how everyone expects you to be, not starting on the ageing process.

I'm sure that trying to do so much brought it [the menopause] on. My mother had hers late, my older sister, who had her children earlier and doesn't work, shows no signs of starting."

Medically, there is no evidence that stress can bring on an early menopause (although it is acknowledged to interfere with menstrual cycles) but the various menopause clinics we spoke to agreed that no research has been done. Usually, although not always, a woman will follow her mother's pattern, yet all the women Were against the family trend and the main difference they saw between themselves and their mothers was the nature of their careers. Increasing anecdotal evidence is needed to prompt the research, says a researcher at the menopause clinic in Guy's Hospital, in Southwark. There is, however, evidence that more and more women are having children later. Even if a link between early menopause and stress is not proved. there will be increasing numbers of women dealing with the peak of their careers, first toddlers and menopause at the same time over the next few years — a modern combina-

"Of course women have always worked and have always been having children into their formes, says Pamela Armstrong, the former news-caster and author of Beating the Biological Clock — The Joys and Challenges of Late Matherhood. "The difference today is that whereas it used to be the eighth or ninth child, now it is the first or second.

"In earlier days, women were practised at motherhood by the time they had their late en are unskilled mothers. Often they have come straight from the boardroom, where everybody jumps at their word into a world of toddlers who behave very differently."

Interestingly. Armstrong discovered while researching her book that it is not just "career women" who are delaying motherhood. "Working-class women are also choosing to have children much later.

It is a result of what Armstrong calls the collapse of the meal ticket. These women realise that, in these days of broken marriages and rela-tionships, it is likely that they will face single motherhood and are putting off children until they are financially secure."

Breast implants are withdrawn

village names bear Viking origins and some of their inhabitants still look Scandinavian. Elsie, a tall, fair-haired giantess, helped to care for me when I was four or five and looked like a character in an Ibsen play.

Once, when I was being more of a nuisance than usual, she seized me and carried me off in disgrace. I retaliated with a hammering of juvenile fists. The effect was dramatic Elsie dissolved into tears, abandoned me and rushed off to find my doctor father.

After calm had been re-stored, I was told that Elsie's collapse was because she believed that the pounding her breasts had received would certainly induce cancer, end all hopes of marriage to her boyfriend, Harry, and probably result in an early death. My fa-ther said to me that although Elsie's fears were based on the myth that injury to breasts caused cancer, it was still as well to treat them with care—and that was why women didn't box or play rugby. Now, of course, they do both without any apparent effect on breastrelated mortality.

The idea that breast cancers

follow physical trauma stemmed from improved diagnosis after an injury, rather than any increased incidence of malignancy. It seems that for some time after any breast trauma women take more care in examining them and, as a result, discover lumps they would otherwise have missed

Breast disease, or injury. still induces an understandable anxiety and every precau-tion needs to be taken to avoid this even when there is no scientific evidence that it is likely to cause lasting ill-effects.

This accounts for the withdrawal by the manufacturers of Translucent breast implants. Of the 5,000 Translucent implants since 1995, 74 have received adverse reports. such as swelling and inflammation of the breast occurring after rupture of the implant sac and the leaking of the con-tained soya oil. The signs and symptoms of the inflammation have been resolved once the implant has been removed. Barry Jones, a consultant surgeon, says: "There is no reason to suppose that there is any long-term ture and subsequent leaking of these implants. However, doctors have been asked to identify patients who have had these implants and report any adverse effects. But health risk as a result of run is no indication to remove any implant thatis not giving rise to trouble.

Breast reonstructive surery is not only one of the forms of cosmetic surgery most often asked for by patients, but the one where the results give the patient the greatest stisfaction. Whereas nose restaping often leaves a patient desatisfied, it is rare to receive complaints about a remodeled breast.

It has been hoped that the Transitent implant would be almost/ideal; it doesn't interfere with X-ray mammography, it can be implanted in front of the pectoralis muscle and fives a natural appearanceand feel. It had also been thought that the oil was inert and it did leak, would be me-tablised by the body. It America, there have also been problems with silicone briast implants and they have ben withdrawn except in post-mastectomy reconstruc-tile surgery. In Britain, an in-

National Hunt season.

No horse has done the triple since Arkle in 1963-64. And there is still the Grand National to go for next month, a race in which Williams has another runner among the favourites, General Wolfe.

At the recent Martell Grand National weights luncheon at the Four Seasons Hotel, in Park Lane, Central London, it was hard to find someone who did not have an opinion about Williams. From the grizzled racing editors of the national papers to the pundits, from the leading bookmakers to the BBC broadcasters Des Lynam and John Inverdale, everyone, it seemed, was talking about her. Why isn't she married? they whispered. Is Teeton Mill carrying an injury? What is her Later, sitting in an empty bar, she spoke of how startled she was by her progress.

"To be honest, the whole thing has taken me over. When I started I had nine horses and now, in three years, I have more than 60, far more than I ever imagined. It's frightening. I've never been in thed. It's frightening. I've never been in this ballpark before. I'm struggling to stand back and look at it objectively. I haven't really had a lead-in period, so quickly have I come from relative obscurity to training the Gold Cup favourite."

Stephen Winstanley, the founder of Winning Line, which own's Teeton Mill, has called Williams a "racing mix of Margaret Thatcher and Princess Diana", her character a blend of silk and size! But the pretensions, speaking in a clipped, though not excessively posh, English county accent. The veteran trainer Jenny Pitman may be known as the first lady of racing, but she is very much one of the boys: a tough, blunt, hard-smoking, expletive-delivering horsewoman. Williams, with her Chanel handbag and thick black hair, is perfumed and fragrant; she would not be out of place in the pages of Harpers

Yet her career almost ended before it began. She was riding as an amateur in a low-key race at Worcester in 1988 when

Was there a moment when she thought that she might never walk again?

"At the time you are living so complete-ly in the moment. You're not thinking 'Oh my God, I'm not going to move again'. I can remember feeling the grass against her horse hit the final hurdle, propelling my face but there was no feeling in the her out of the saddle. She landed on her head on hard ground, breaking the hangman's bone in her neck. "If the bone had her neck to my body. After about ten minutes, with people rubber-necking, I started genting pins and needles all the way down my arms and legs. The feeling raised to a great intensity, faded away and then 1 could feel everything again.

She spent the next three months in traction in hospital at Worcester. The incident concentrated her thinking, coming as it did just weeks after she had been knocked unconscious after falling at Becher's Brook while riding in the Grand National - she was one of the few women to compete in the race before the course

"A friend from the Jockey Club advised me to give up, reminding me that I wasn't riding to earn my living. You never know how strong the fracture was and what might happen next time." She fleetingly considered returning to secretarial work (she is a 100-words-a-minute shorthand typist) before she began her long apprenticeship as a trainer, working in Australia and the United States, alongside the pioneering Martin Pipe and as an assistant to John Edwards.

The emergence of Williams is exactly what National Hunt racing has been waiting for. The poor relation of the Flat, the embattled winter sport has been buffered in recent months by race-rigging scandals, unease about excessive use of the whip by certain riders, diminishing prize funds and the agitation of animal rights protesters.

The sport has also been called reactionary and chauvinistic; but Williams will say only: "I've not encountered any prob-lems. I'm a woman, the others are men. So what, I can't see the big deal."

Williams, 35, grew up in the Herefordshire countryside, where she still lives, the daughter of a gentleman farmer. Her grandparents owned and raced horses on the Flat, and both her paternal grandfather and her father were masters of the local hunt - which she is, at first, embarrassed to reveal. "Why?" I ask. "Well," she hesitates, looking at her feet. "I don't know if you can talk about hunt-ing these days. People get frightfully excited about it and take terrible offence. And it's true that we do make enormous demands on our horses, perhaps in a slightly unnatural way, because after all we are training them to win races, to be fitter and go faster than any of their rivals. But I suppose saying my father was a master of a hunt is not on a par with Mr Hoddle's comments. At least, I hope not." She raises her head, smiling.

ne wonders how much Williams's remarkable rise has cost her, how much she has had to sacrifice on the altar of her ambition. She concedes that her work is gruelling, and that she has "little time for anything else". A typical day begins at 6.30am when, assisted by her head lad, she feeds each of her horses. "Then I ride out with the first lot of horses. If a particular horse is entered for a race the following day, I decide whether to run it or not: then I might go racing, which could mean travelling to the other side of the country. If I'm not going racing, I spend time on the gallops and then work in the office. watching races on the Racing Channel, watching races on the Racing Channel, talking to owners and organising stuff." Organising stuff — administration work and grappling with the logistics of running an expanding stables — can be the most demanding part of her day, and she often works long into the night.

"It can be a demanding and tiring life," she says. "I live alone, I have no family, although my secretary lives in the granny annexe on the site. Most of the time I'm working very late and I feel quite isolated at times. The whole thing has run away with me really, with more and more owners attracted to the stables. Sometimes feel like saying 'Hold on, no more'."

So what of the rumours surrounding Teeton Mill's fitness in the febrile run-up to the Gold Cup on March 18? He won at Ascot on February 20, and Williams says that he is fine. "In fact, he bit me the other morning. I was feeling his legs, which I do to all the horses when I feed them, to check that their tendons are not inflamed, and he bit me on the bottom."

There are many men who would want to do the same, I joke, such are the haz-ards of being the talented trainer of a champion grey.

hen Carrie, of Chan-nel 4's Sex and the City, said she want-ed to have sex "the way men do", there was a gasp of recognition from women. A year ago I was expressing the same desire, so I did something about it - I went to a sex party.

I am an attractive, intelligent, professional, single woman - just like the characters in the series - and I wanted an experience free from guilt, angst, shame and commit-ment. That is exactly what I got, and I have no regrets. But where Carrie et al are motivated by bitterness at men's perceived perfidy they want to turn the tables on the guys - I just wanted sex without a relationship. So Ichose the most direct route to fulfil that desire. I was recently divorced, on the wrong side of 35, with three children to bring up. I was working sporadically (as a part-time broadcast journalist) and had no chance to go out in the evening. My chances of meeting a man were slim. One side effect of being a mother at home on your own can be the loss of self-confidence, I began to doubt my own auractiveness as it was not being verified by others. I knew I needed to have one-onone human contact.

This mixture of sexual frustration, lack of opportunity and self-doubt continued until I read an article in a magazine about people with alternative views of the world. One, a performance artist, mentioned going to sex parties where he enjoyed group sex, tantric sex, voyeurism - the works. A contact number was given for an organisation that ran parties in London. I had expected sleaze; instead I found a sensuous, laid-back atmosphere. There were some 300 partygoers present, comprising heterosexual couples, gay couples and straight and gay singles. Some people wore suits or dresses, others were dressed in leather and rubber, fur and leathers. Some were having sex in shadowy corners, others were chatting or the parties was not necessarily sex but a feeling of liberation at being among like-minded peo-ple, all of whom were free of sexual hang-ups, who simply wanted to relax. They found the parties destressed them, just as alcohol, smoking, sports or recreational drugs might do for others. Any sex that did take place was entirely consensual, and there were strict rules about women being treated with respect and courtesy. (Single men find it hardest to have a sexual encounter at these events as they greatly outnumber the women.) As one of the few women without a male partner, I was treated with a nuge amount of fuss by some good-looking, intelligent and articulate men. It sounds tacile, but that alone helped me to regain my confidence. Some may say swingers triv-ialise sex, that it should be a sacred union between a man and a woman for the purpose of procreation. Others may say I was naive, that I saw only what I wanted to see, that the women there were pressurised into attending by their boy-friends or husbands bent on titillation to pep up a stale relationship. I cannot swear blind that that is not true. But I saw people making a positive choice that was not harming anyone else; the women entered into the spirit of things as enthusiastically as the men. There were free condoms and a lot of laughter. As long as one goes to these parties with a clear head about what they entail - sex for recreation, no more, no less -- I believe that they serve a useful outlet for the tensions of everyday life. They are an escape.

Maybe I am being superficial, and when I believed I was suffering from sexual frustration what I really wanted was to be loved. Because, as we all know, sex is easy, love is hard. But I got what I felt I needed at the time with no harm done to anyone, least of all myself.

Utopia is reborn a mile in the air

Or so the architects displayed in two provocative Glasgow shows would have you think. Marcus Binney reports

Yokohama's future starts in Glasgow: a model of Japan's new international port terminal

isionary architects dream of building in impossible places. None more so than Frank Lloyd Wright, whose work is on show in a fantastic exhibition at the Kelvingrove Museum as part of Glasgow 1999, Glasgow's Year of Architecture. One proposed house is perched on the edge of a giant meteor crater, another on a man-made spur over the Pacific with a series of telescopic echo chambers designed to amplify the sound of waves crashng against the rocks below.

An impressive number of these designs were actually built, most famously Wright's house at Fallingwater. David De Long, the show's organiser, says that Wright's clients, the Kaufmanns, were astounded. 'They expected the house would be looking at the waterfall, not sitting on top of it."

High on a rocky hillside
near Phoenix, Wright built a house to which ecologists would surely object today. But he bedded it so well in the terrain that there is no evident scar. Wright worshipped nature and his drawings are full of instructions to leave plants and trees undisturbed.

What makes this show so spellbinding is the number of visionary drawings that look as futuristic today as when they were new in the 1950s. As this is a travelling show, they are not the originals (which could not endure such long exposure to light) but back-lit colour photographs, all the actual size of the architect's large presentation drawings.

The originals are preserved in Wright's studio at Taliesin. All were approved by Wright, but some are clearly the work of apprentices working under his direction, with touches (such as greenery) added by the maestro. His drawings are actually more arresting in this illuminated form, as is evident from the throng of visitors absorbed in the displays.

There are also a remarkable number of first-class models, including one for Wright's (unbuilt) tapering mile-high sky-scraper, the forerunner of the kilometre-high tower that Sir Norman Foster is seeking to build in Tokyo Bay.

The theme is 'the living city". Wright's own Utopia where often huge buildings are carefully spaced in open country. Here are his archetypes for every activity - offices. churches. schools, shop-ping, the arts and leisure. as well as individual houses and blocks of apartments. It's a solution that might work in the American West, where there is lots of space, and would indeed be better than, say, the unending sprawl that is covering north Italy from Milan to Venice. But it would require draconian planning powers of the type that architects tend to be the first to attack.

rchitecture on a gi-ant scale is also the theme of Glasgow 1999's other show, Vertigo, which looks in detail at ten major projects around the world that have been conceived by developers and politicians as much as by architects. Devised by the crit-ic Rowan Moore and architects Caruso St John, it is set against soaring walls of white plasterboard installed in the Victorian Old Fruitmarket and intended as a foretaste of the new Tate Gallery at Bankside.

It is done in a scrupulously neutral way, leaving the visi-tor to decide what is class and what is kitsch. Hacienda housing for the rich and the latest themed shopping malls in America alternate with Foster's new Hong Kong Airport and Richard Rogers's Millennium Dome. And it shows that the new commercial centre of Shanghai has a classic of skyscraper design in the shape of the World Financial Centre. now rising to the design of Kohn Pedersen Fox.

Though it has been unkindly compared to a chisel, it inthrough 94 floors, beginning as a square, becoming a hexagon and ending up a blade. The huge hole at the top was conceived for a Ferris wheel, which proved impractical at such a height, but it will give China's new super-rich the chance to boast that they can fly a helicopter through the eye of the proverbial needle.

Another stunning project is the Duisburg-Nord park in Germany's Ruhr region. In Britain we have systematically cut up most of our rusting steel mills for scrap. The Rhinelanders have preserved them as monuments, turning them into attractive places by planting thousands of trees so they take on the aspect of a set for the palace in Sleeping Beauty. A series of summer events is held there and it's possible to climb 80ft up the walkways which served for inspecting the blast furnaces.

Strangest of all is the port terminal designed for Yokohama in Japan. The hope is that it will be as sensationally sculptural as the Guggenheim Museum in Bilbao.

It's fashionable in architectural circles to despise Disney but applaud Las Vegas. This exhibition puts the spotlight on the latest American themed shopping malls. Yet what exactly is the difference between Disney and a plastic-looking magic grapevine at Ontario Mills in Los Angeles, with lipstick-coloured grapes and toadstools for children to sit on? Except that Disney does it better. Not resolved here (though the book of the exhibition goes deeper) is just what sort of a mess some of these megalomanic projects are making of the planet. Go to Macau. Around a peninsula that, a iew years ago, was as verdant as the Cap d'Antibes they are simply tipping mountains into the sea, creating flat building land for rows of abysmal close-packed apartments that it would be an insult to call barrack blocks. Here, alas, are the siums of tomorrow. Last summer, at the International Union of Architects, I heard furious German critics denounce Europe's top architects for happily designing China's new Utopias without a thought for the hundreds of thousands of people who would be turned out of their homes for these new office developments. By mounting such ambi-tious and thought-provoking shows, Glasgow's Festival of Architecture highlight's London's dismal performance in this area. If the V&A wants to be taken seriously as the pafrom of new architecture (as the Libeskind Spiral suggests it does) it should put on challenging exhibitions on the subject, like the campaigning heritage shows of the 1970s. So should the Royal Academy and even more the new Tate Gallery at Bankside.

Reviewed by take Burn "PLAY my Kreisleriana sometimes," Robert Schumann wrote to the 19-year-old Clara Wieck. "You'll find a wild, unbridled love there, together with your life and mine, and many of your glances."

Schumann pinched the ti-tle for these eight Fantasies from a writer close to his heart: E.T.A. Hoffmann. who had given the name to a collection of short stories dominated by a rampaging composer he called Johan-nes Kreisler. At 28 Schumann already had two fantasy personas of his own: dynamic Florestan and wistful Eusebius.

Welcoming Hoffmann's deranged Kapellmeister into the family of alter egos came quite naturally. While on one level Kreisleriana is Schumann's Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man, on another it is a love letter to Clara, the woman he was forbidden to see. "When you recognise yourself in my Kreisleriana," he told her, "you'll smile to yourself, a gentle, fond smile."

The challenge for inter-preters of Kreisleriana is to capture this private tender-ness as well as the driven, demonic intensity that gal-lops by its side. Radu Lupu and Martha Argerich excel in the sinister nocturnal world that Schumann made his own. With his pearl-like beauty of sound and the crystal clarity of his vision Murray Perahia (Sony Classical SK 62786, £15.99) is a revelation in a different way, placing places Kreisleriana as an early Romantic

The burghers of Hampstead are up in arms about their local theatre's plans to expand. Dalya Alberge reports

Why must the show go on?

he Hampstead Thea-tre, the North London playhouse which has staged groundbreaking productions since the 1960s. is shrugging off fierce public objections to its planned multimillion-pound expansion in Swiss Cottage, financed with government and National Lottery money. In a case that could have wide implications for other lottery projects. Hampstead residents do not want as much as £20 million spent on a redevelopment that could threaten local facilities.

What angers them is that green open space on a site roughly the size of a football pitch is being threatened. Their park may be small, they say, but it is still a place in which to breathe and where the elderly and mothers with prams can stroll. Furthermore, locals fear that an allweather sports pitch, a children's playground, a commu-nity centre and a street market will make way for a massively expanded theatre with little relevance for most people in the community.

Even some of those who enjoy theatre share this view, accepting that there must be priorities for local resources: for ty centre — which caters for 50,000 people a year — re-ceives just £800 in annual subsidy from the public purse. Camden council's planning approval ran into strong criticism when two councillors were found to be on the theatre board and to have voted for the plan despite being told by the council's legal advisers to

The arched catfish mouth that means he's unhappy is yet another, and there is always his casual talent for inhabiting shiny suits.

But in the presence of the master a moment's seriousness is called for. The starting point for a ritual hagiography of the most talented actor of his generation must be the fact that he is merely an actor. Much as we would like him to be the actual face of organised crime (The Godfather, Part II; The Untouchables; Goodfellas), or of high-level political troubleshooting (Wag the Dog), or even of honest detective work (Cop Land), the deflating truth is that De Niro is only pretending. There is plenty of evidence that this makebelieve is less of a stretch in his gangster films than in his others - he has done it well and often and, as a lifelong resident of New York's Little Italy,

He plays Paul Vitti, itomaculate on the outside but crippled mentally by midlife anxiety attacks. Faced with a snivelling lowlife waiting to be clobbered over the head wish a lead pine, he cannot bring himself to clobber. Given a clear shot at a hitman who just tried to kill him, he cannot shoot. Humping grimly on top of his mistress in an hotel room, he cannot, as he puts it, "do this here". And watching a commercial about fatherly investment advice, he weens.

These are life-threatening lapses, given the game he's in - one that tolerates not a whiff of weakness in a leader at the not good times. Brooklyn's crime families are circling each other nervously and "on top of everything else you've got these Chinese and these crazy Russians to deal with. Vitti's saviour, and De

Niro's foil, is the grey-bearded, silken-tongued Dr Ben Sobel, alias Billy Crystal. He bumps into Vitti's gang literally, rear-ending two of them in a traffic jam and getting off

ing a gagged body in their boot. Quicker than it takes to say "we know where your Mom lives", he is forced to take on an unwelcome new patient with the aim of making him "a happy, well-adjusted gangster". This proves hard. When told about Freud and the Oedipal myth, for instance, Vitti's first response is "i"ing Greeks".

The conceit in Analyze This nal; HBO has a hit TV series called The Sopranos running along the same hoodhuns-intherapy lines. But the execution is the best Hollywood can buy. De Niro brings to the part all the coiled intensity that emptied most journalists' cliche files years ago. He plays the whole thing as straight as his perfect nose and leaves the comedy entirely to timing. True, his performance zings and very violent Goodfellas, but this only seems to crank it up tighter. What it amounts to, as Janet Maslin wrote in The New York Times (meaning it in the nicest possible way), is "one long wink at the viewer". Crystal resists the impulse he laughs flow easily in Analyze This. The tricky part, plot-wise, is squeezing Vitti into falls to Friends' Lisa Kudrow to resist this as the doctor's exasperated fiancée, and even with a thin part she proves a cut above most sitcom graduates. Joe Viterelli, meanwhile, as a memorable blob-like enforcer called Jelly, extracts Kudrow's groom whenever his boss needs him. Thanks to ble with words like "closure" and Crystal does a bravura turn as a mobster, firing from the hip with enough wide-bore psychobabble to cow a barnful of his client's predatory rivals.

Roger Ebert of the Chicago Sun Times, America's most powerful critic, decided this film's secret star — the one who makes its comedy more than skin-deep — is actually Vi-terelli. Others paid tribute to its director, Harold Ramls. who was able to fine-tune the dialogue having been in psy chotherapy for years himself.

But the truth is this is De Niro's film, in a different genre but also a different league from Payback, the ugly thriller starring Mel Gibson that is also now in wide release. Unlike Gibson's, De Niro's films have never earned huge sums. Indeed, his career box-office gross of $912 million from 50 releases is considered meagre. After this all bets are off.

Dogma of the reigning cats

whip up publicity for your difficult lowbudget movie. Issue a statement asserting that film is dead and you are its saviour. Attach a ten-point manifesto setting forth how mings should really be done. Be very circumspect about how seriously you take it all. And, finally, come up with a couple of refreshingly original films which go on to win awards around the world.

For the past few months Thomas Vinterberg and Lars von Trier, the directors respectively of Festen (now on release) and The Idiots (out next month), have been leading the world a merry dance. No one has been quite sure just how seriously to take these two eminently plausible but - surely - slightly crazy Danes.

Their "Dogme 95" programme is a self-styled "rescue mission" for cinema which argues the virtues of no-frills film-making. Like an order of filmic Freemasons, its rimals include a Vow of Chastity, a Certificate of Compliance, a Confession of Transgressions and a Plea for Absolution. "The movie was dead and called for resurrection," intones the mission statement, dismissing the new wave as "a ripple that washed ashore and turned to muck" and the concept of the auteur as mere "bourgeois romanticism". In their place is a set of ten on location, with no broughtin props or sets; that the sound must be recorded along with the images; that only handthat no special lighting can be used. To cap it all, the director must not be credited.

At first sight, trussing your-self up in ten inviolable commandments seems like an odd way to go about trying to break free from convention. At a press conference held at the Danish Embassy last November several reporters won-dered why the Dogme manifes-to was so — well, dogmatic. To Vinterberg's chagrin, even the director of the London Film Festival labelled the project

The brothers of the Dogme order (as they will insist on calling themselves) must be laughing up their sleeves. Of course the hyperbole is a bit of fun. "I swear as a director to refrain from personal taste," goes the creed. "I am no longer an artist." Fat chance: Vinterberg happily admits that both done". His influences - Bergman, Coppola, Roeg - fairly jump off the screen. Moreover, he found that the rules gave held cameras are allowed: that ... his cast rather too much freethe film must be in colour and dom. "They felt a bit insecure. so I had to invent other ways to limit them."

But underneath all the pomposity, there is much that is sensible about the movement. Its purpose, says Vinterberg. is simply to question the need for the vast paraphernalia that has grown up around direc-tors, to avoid what he calls "autopilot film-making". If you want to get away from in-grained norms, he says sensibly, you have to give yourself a contrary set of rules.

It may all sound a bit Luddite, but it seems to have worked. The raw material of Festen — the tensions of a family gathering, the shocking reve-lation of abuse — are well served by the virtual absence of the usual post-production trickery and the confused. grainy intimacy recorded by the hand-held video camera.

Vinterberg claims that the other yows, too, were more liberating than restricting. The novel idea of bringing the camera to the actors rather than vice versa, he suggests, encour-aged ensemble acting in place of set-piece grandstanding. They had to act to each other and not to the camera," he says. He is right: watching this tortured celebration is uncomfortably akin to intruding on private grief.

ut. Vinterberg insists, the most important leature of Dogme films is that they are honest to what was shot, that they forge a sense of immediacy between actors and audience. "Movies have been cosmeticised to death." he contends. (He means this literally: the use of make-up is forbidden.) "Here, all that you see took place." So what comes next? Inevitably, something completely dif-ferent. "This whole project is about renewal. Making anoth-er Dogme film right afterwards would be very boring." Vinterberg says. Von Trier, too, has deserted the order to make a big-budget extravagan-za starring the singer Björk. Definitely not a Dogme film it even has a soundtrack.

Happily, though, there are others to carry the torch. As well as two other Danish directors, three new converts, one Swedish; one French and one American, have taken their vows. The founders now find themselves the proud possessors of an academy, ready to certify films for their Dogmeness. You sense they are pleasantly surprised

Nicolette Jones finds out why Ottakar's chain of bookshops has signed up cartoonist Chris Burke to change the local face of its 63 branches

Cartoon king of a bookish Bohemia

f you go into an Ot-takar's bookshop in Bury St Edmunds or Chelmsford, Ports-Chelmsford, Ports-Chelmsford mouth, Hudderstield or Carlisle, you will see around the shop several substantial murals of caricatured writers, drawn in the Searle/Scarfe/ Steadman tradition. Faces you may or may not recognise range from Bill Bryson and Balzac to Palin and Proust.

in each of these towns, the unique composition of local luminaries and places of interest, making the shop itself a place of artistic interest. All these works are by the hand of cartoonist Chris Burke, who has found in the bookshop chain (63 branches, all eventually to be adorned by his draughtsmanship) a patron which will offer an outlet for his work for years to come. •He Ottakar's bookshops - located in originally towns rather than big cities - were founded ten years ago by James Henedepicted age, whose father. Simon, happens to be a cartoon collector as well as the Cooper as author of various dictionaries of cara horse? toonists and the founder of the Cartoon Arts Trust. Simon owns Britain's largest collection of contemporary cartoons, and houses it in a barn beside his home in Somerset. Indeed, when James established his bookshop chain, he gave it a name he found in a cartoon strip: reading Tintin in the bath, he found a reference to King Ottakar of Bohemia who, thanks to Herge's careful research, really existed. As a consequence, Ottakar's celebrated its tenth birthday by taking its book-shop managers to Prague, the capital of Bohemia and birthplace of two kings called Ot staff presented him there with four first editions of Tintin. It is not surprising, then, that when Ottakar's sought to rebrand the chain (which had hitherto operated as if it were a collection of independent shops, with a lot of decentralised power — still a strength) it crossed Heneage's mind to use a cartoonist to give the branchtakar. And Heneage's grateful work, and the artist, on principle, was to have a fairly free hand. There was a precedent for this: Oddbins off-licences had employed Ralph Stead-man for some 15 years, and what suited the bibulous would, it was thought, suit the

The art director of Ottakar's original design company, DIN, found Burke in the Contact directory, which is to art-ists what Spotlight is to actors. He remembers, for instance, once being asked by a newspaper to make Jeffrey Archer "look less like a weasel" (Archer later bought the artwork of the re-vised version, and Burke, who only stuck on Archer's more cherubic portrait with spray mount, fantasises that one day, in mid-dinner party, the revision will fall off, exposing the weaselly original to Archer and his guests).

They group writers at a tea party, in a bar, on a farm, at a station (the travel writers), and in a witch's lair (the fantasists). Burke has a trick of fusing author and creation into one image, so that, for in-

Burke is currently decorating Ottakar's new shops with individual local murals as they open, at a rate of 15 branches a year. But as the existing shops come up for a refit, he will tackle them too. Which means his commission will be like painting the Forth

He is also working on a mural for the children's sections (a priority in Ottakar's shops) and has drawn a machine for the Science Museum bookshop that recalls Heath Robinson — who is well repre-sented in Simon Heneage's colection: Added to this, he is responsible for posters for speial promotions, and 120 draw-ne of the benefits of the Royal Opera House's temporary closure has been the increased presence of the Royal Ballet in the regions. For two years in a row the company has mounted two Dance Bites tours, bringing star dancers and new ballets to provincial audiences. ## From painters to poets

f masterpieces are defined partly by their ability to stand the test of time, it is probably too early to tell what most of the great works of the 1980s will be. Only a few scores speak with the origi-nality and authority to make such status instantly recognisable, but the range of music being covered in Edge of a dream... the 80s, the latest instalment of the Towards the Millennium journey through 20th-century music, should help to make this sorting process clearer.

Saturday's programme by the City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra, the first concert of this Eighties jamboree, opened with a work that has "master-piece" stamped all over it: Lutoslawski's Third Symphony. Simon Rattle, returning to his old orchestra, conducted with all his trademark energy to get playing of fluidity and tension, just what is needed in this luminous score.

From the short, sharp shock of the opening fanfare, a hammering that returns to punctuate the work's big moments, the piece unfolds with a mixture of intense calm and agitation. The symphony, pre-

Though the three movements run into each other, the solid serenity of the opening is very different from the vigour of the middle and its ferocious climax, and both contrast with the interweaving themes of the third movement that build towards ecstatic waves of sound.

Takemitsu's place in the pantheon of music is harder to assess, but there is no doubting the beauty of his images. In the guitar concerto To the Edge of Dream. also dating from 1983, his starting point was the surrealist painter Paul Delvaux, and the work conjures up vivid but fleet-

As a companion piece. Takemitsu composed Vers, l'arc en ciel, Palma for the CBSO, and here it was joined by Williams again and by Christine Pendrill, the oboe d'amore soloist. Written in homage to Joan Miró and his homeland, the score has a warmth rare in Takemitsu. Neither Lutoslawski nor Takemitsu are quintessential Eighties composers, but John Adams is, not least for the Post-Modernism of the diatonic renewal that began in such pieces as his Harmonium (1981). A new take on the old Romantic choral work, Harmonium sets, and sometimes breaks up, poems by John Donne and Emily Dickinson. With its hypnotic effects and pulsating climaxes it is a powerful score, but there are long-winded passages of the kind Adams has now left behind. The City of Birmingham Symphony Chorus was on splendid form, and Rattle's exuberance and charisma made this a performance of conviction.

 and instrumentalists, Vocals dominated, while strings and keyboards sounded thin and did not maintain impetus. The only whiff of the Eighties in this concert was the orchestra's gaudy waistcoats - looking like period pieces - a charge that cannot be made against either Bhakti nor Tehilim. Both hover somewhere in the past 40 years, highpoints in the oeuvres of two composers whose spiritual conviction has brought a disciplined urgency to their work. But it is Bhakti which gives up its secrets more slowly, and which will have the longer life.

Well-mannered intensity

recital by the Emerson String Quartet is always a special event. but their appearance at the Queen Elizabeth Hall on Thursday night was notable in two very visible ways. First, the two violinists alternated, so that Philip Setzer led for a Mozart quartet, while Eugene Drucker led for Sibelius and Schubert. Second, the violist, Lawrence Dutton, sat on the extreme right, where you normally expect the cellist to be.

The combined result was of greater than usual projection of the players individually. partly because switching leadparty because swirthing leader keeps everybody on their toes, and partly because the viola's proximity to the audience aids audibility, while David Finckel's big cello tone comes through easily anyway. In Mozart's D Major Quartet, K575, dedicated to the cello leader. dedicated to the cello-loving King of Prussia, the composer gave the cello part a natural prominence. Finckel rose splen-didly to the challenge, raising his voice eloquently above conversational level when required. It was, nevertheless, an impeccably mannered account by the ensemble: elegantly phrased and subtly voiced.

The Sibelius Quartet in D Minor, subtitled Voces Intimae, also offers an element of foreboding. The rushing fig-ures and ostinati familiar from Sibelius's symphonic works make their presence felt, especially in the first and last movements, the end of the latter generating a momenturn of great force from these players. The fleet movement of the first of the Scherzos was also impressively delivered, not least in the precision of the silences that interrupt the torrent of notes. The central Adagio was the still heart of the work, its fast chord tailing movingly into oblivion. Schubert's Death and the Maiden Quartet neatly com-bined Mozartian manners and Sibelian intensity. The Emerson's approach is not demonstrative or histrionic, and the obsessiveness of the work projected by rhythmic means rather than dynamic. This ensemble is also able to draw on a remarkable range of tone colour with a spectral quality exploited particularly tellingly in the slow movement (Death addressing the Maiden in the original Schubert song). A more ethereal tone was found for the fourth, majorkey variation, which captured the fragility of this celestial vision. Then came the dance of death finale, its coda not so much a race to the finish as a headlong rush to the abyss.

Both plays take us towards dark areas of family discontent, but the risk of aridity is reduced to zero by Churchill's inventive wit. What emerges in the first is a father's inchoate feelings for his daughter, absent in Australia these many years but due back any moment. He, his wife and a faintly dotty sister wait for the doorbell to ring, returning a score of times to the same stretch of barbed domestic chit-chat, until we come to see these variams as some of the fears and fantasies that come to us all

include John Coltrane, so it was fitting that the first piece of overt jazz Groupo Eleggua played should have been the great man's Resolution, from A Love Supreme. Both Haynes, with a passionately grainy alto solo, and pianist Trevor Watkis, with a more restrained but intriguing contribution, succeeded in imbuing the familiar repeated melody with a suitable mix of fervour and meditativeness. By the time the band launched themselves into a Haynes original, 42nd St Thing, their energy levels were high. The presence of steel-drum player Wade Austin, however, brought an entirely unexpect-ed texture into the mix, and his rattling yet tuneful solos provided some of the music's most memorable moments. More boppish fare - a quicksilver theme called Snap Shot - followed, Haynes's tart alto slithering over Watkis's clipped piano chords and Daniel Crosby's neatly turnbling drums. But it was with more chaming to Bata drum accompaniment that Groupo Eleggua concluded their performance.

Although no whiff of didacticism is discernible in their music, Haynes's band somehow contrive to be both thoughtprovoking and entertaining even danceable - and their brand of deeply-felt, multitextured, punchily percussive jazz demands to be more widely heard.

A Budget for kids, or child's play?

· Stand by today for another

exhibition of playground politics

hat is a Budget for children? Is it one that encourages us to procreate, perhaps by removing VAT from Spanish Fly or allowing the NHS to distribute Viagra with the same airy nonchalance as it now hands out contraceptives? Or is it one which allows Gordon the Godfather to indulge paternal feelings which his political career has, so far, prevented him from enjoying?

Are the nation's little ones to find that Christmas has come Raider software is to be sent to every household along with an explanation of the Budget package?

The precise nature of what Mr Brown means by a Budget for the kiddies will have to wait until he opens his red box this afternoon, although one could wallpaper Dorneywood with the leaks so far. Looking. however, at the Chancellor's previous Budgets, they are all, in a sense, for children. Mr Brown treats the voters like kids. He asks us to believe he is not, by instinct, a tax-raising Chancellor, and yet he has already increased expenditure in this Parliament by £40 billion. Like the Tooth Fairy in reverse, Mr Brown takes away money while he hopes were sleeping and trusts we will not being insufficiently cynical to appreciate the audacity of his myth-making. He presumes upon our innocent faith that what we see in the headlines is what we will get in our tax bills. But Mr Brown flatters the press in order to deceive the taxmaver.

He does so by using three tactics. They are applied daiplaygrounds. The first is the bully's gracious mercy, the second the boaster's grandiose gesture and the third the pickpocker's stealthy grab.

We have been treated to the the past week. The Chancellor had let it be known that he was considering the taxation of child benefit and a reduction in the married couple's tax allowance. Having thus made middle-class flesh creep. the Treasury then signalled to the press that a reprieve was on the way. In order to avoid "alienating Middle England". any change would be delayed. If the Chancellor does, indeed. forbear to hit thousands of families in the manner advertised, we will be invited to applaud his tender concern. But it is the tender concern of the thug who, after having placed his fist under your chin and then extended his free hand for your wallet, feels moved to desist.

The boaster's grandiose gesture is a technique not restricted to the Treasury. The competition for biggest boaster in the Cabinet is almost as fierce as that for places in Kathryn Blair's secondary school. Robin Cook has a decent claim to the title, with a proudly trumpeted ethical dimension to foreign policy which amounts to giving leaks from select committees to his aides, rather than reading them himself. But, as so often in the past. Robin is beaten to the prize by

Gordon Brown. In his pre-Budget leaking, the Chancellor has tried to pose not just as the saviour of the British economy, but the Earth itself. Gordon went proposal to put the environment first. The big idea for our little planet? A lower road tax for smaller cars. By knocking 250 off the price of a tax disc for economical motors, the Chancellor apparently hoped that polluters would trade in their petrol-guzzling Bentleys for Fiat Unos. Mr Brown is addicted to these little bribes for grand reasons. From tax breaks for research and development to the Working Families Tax Credit, little fiscal fiddles are given Capital Letters and a New Era of Social Justice has been inaugurated My press release is higger than your press release. This schoolyard boasting is entirely strategy of treating voters as children. Do as you're told, and there's a sweetie for you. It is when it comes to tax rates overall that Gordon's third playground technique comes into play; the pickpocket's stealthy grab. The Shadow Chancellor. Francis Maude. has drawn detailed attention to the "stealth taxes" by which Mr Brown has lined his own pockets after dipping into ours. But don't just take Mr word for it. The Labour MP Rhodri Morgan, speaking on BBC TV's On The Record at the weekend, let the car out of the bag and then explained how skilfully the Chancellor skinned it. He was perfectly happy with taxation by stealth. "It's not duplicitous," he maintained, "it means you don't make a people that you've raised their taxes. If they don't notice, then all credit to you." It is the grab today. Like any successful pickpocket he will stage a diversion, possibly by announcing a new starting rate for income tax at 10p in the pound. But while we stare rapt at this tricksiness we will be gently relieved of our mortgage tax relief, future inherit-ances and other allowances.

Robin Hood as the Artful

Disappearing along with our earnings is any notion that the Treasury should treat us like adults. Families and firms should not be bribed through the tax system to act in what the Chancellor considers to be their best interest. What industrial expertise, after all, does Gordon Brown bring to bear when he rigs the tax system to cajole companies into spending a state-approved amount on research and development? I don't want a Budget for children. I want a Budget for voters and companies to keep as much of their money as possible and do with it what they, not the State, consider right. But instead of an adult approach to economics all we have is Gordon Brown pro-

michael.gove@the-times.co.uk claiming: "Suffer the little children." And we will.

This harvest of greed

being a subsistence farmer or fisherman is having your product sniggered at by rich, distant urbanites. They giggle about haddock, or fodderbeet, or pigs, or bananas, while to you and your children those hilarious items make the difference between a respectable life and misery. So stop the banana jokes. We have had the headlines about banana skins and banana splits, the arch stuff about aphrodisiacs and Eurocrats going bananas. It gets less funny by the minute. Try, rather, to see the old comedian's prop as a symbol of hope, self-respect, justice, life itself. For that is what it is, if you are trying to live off five or ten acres of banana trees on an island in the Caribbean: a place where your ancestors were brought in chains and whose small territory now represents the only place in > the current banana trade war is not Nor, with respect to many commentators, is it an occasion for legalistic chop-logic over which protagonist — the EU or the US — is most in breach of World Trade Organisation rules. It looks as if they both are. The EU has been devious, and the US has adopted its all-too-familiar role of global bully. But at least the EU nations have been devious and dilatory because they are trying to behave ethically. The Americans are just in it for the money. Big companies such as Chiquita want to force a monopoly, and the Clinton Administration wants Chiquita to go on footing Democrat campaign bills. Both sides may be out of step legally, but

children have an unquestioned

right to live. From that perspective, at least the European nations have human justice on their minds. Justice can sometimes be above law. When Lord Denning died last week, much was made of the nerve he showed in habitually saying just that. In obituaries we heard his voice again, denying bending the law but twinklingly admitting to "developing" it. In a legalistic, fearful and untrustful world, his is a difficult vision to maintain, but it is worth trying. In this banana dispute America is attempting to use international law to force a despicable moral injustice.

Consider the case. Every year. Europe imports 3.9 million tonnes of bananas. Two thirds come from industry.

Bananas are a joke only when your entire society is not in peril plantations, mainly in South America, controlled by a few big American corporations. African, Caribbean and Pacific countries — which between them send the other third - are given preferential treatment over tariffs. Many of them are former European colonies; moreover, they operate small-scale farms, where the cost of unmecha-nised harvesting is almost three times that of a hi-tech Ecuadorean dollar plantation".

The American companies, however, claim that they are "losing" up to $520 million a year by not being able to push their intensive product even further into the European market, It sounds a lot, but companies — Chiquita — is a fourteenbillion-dollar outfit. it is evident that the difference they hope to make to their own profits is not a matter of life and death to them. Assisted by illegal and high-handed sanctions from the American Administration, they might get their way. President Clinton seems anxious to help them. and strangely unembarrassed by the fact that they pay so much money to his party (America lodged its latest complaint about the banana regime within 24 hours of the Democrat cause receiving a fresh half-million dollar cheque from Chiquita). If the big boys do win, EU supermarkets will allow themselves to be flooded by the fruit to which the all-powerful Man from Del Monte (or Chiquita, or Dole) has said yes. The Caribbean farmers in particular, although they have only 9 per cent of the European market, will simply be ruined; the fragile societies they hold up will either collapse into lawlessness and the drug trade, or be held even more to ransom by the almost equally ruthless operators of the tourist

The EU ministers know this, which is why they have kept ducking the issue. It is callous to say smoothly, as one leader did, that "Rules, unlike bananas, may not be heat of the beautiful to the same than the same transfer of the same transf bent if global trade is to thrive". Phooey. Some rules have to be bent, or as Denning would say "devel-oped", in the interests of a just and peaceful world. Europe is historicaly the parent of most of these countries. It cannot shake off its relationship with them.

The EU governments, not least our own, should unapologetically make it clear to America which preens itself on being global policeman and guardian of righteousness — that we too have moral duously.

The American reply is that if Europe wants to help the Caribbean it should do it through aid. Rubbish. Aid is nowhere near as beneficial to a society and economy as respectable trade. Small banana plantations - of a kind multinationals call

"inefficient" - create employment and self-respect and contribute immeasurably more to a small country than any amount of foreign aid with all the usual greasy strings attached. Another reply is that Caribbean islands should concentrate on the tourist trade. Why? Tourism in poor regions gets con-trolled largely by foreign compa-nies, who siphon the profits overseas. All the locals get are low-paid jobs; fine for some, but for others there will always be more fulfilment in harvesting real food for real export than in picking up tourists' discarded swimsuits from chalet

Even self-interest should warn America not to play this game. At the weekend Caricom, the regional trade group for the Caribbean, issued a retaliatory threat. Its 15 members are reconsidering their agreement with the US drugs enforcement agencies. These have hitherto been, rather reluctantly. allowed to chase suspected traffickers into the territorial waters of these islands. Now Caricom gives warning that this permission may be withdrawn. Considering how easy it already is for drug smug-glers to lose their pursuers among the reefs and islets of the region, the threat is a serious one. But for the islanders it would be a bitter, tragic revenge to create safe havens for the world's most ruthless criminals. The last thing any Caribbean island needs is to import the violence and degradation of that trade to wreck its society and tourism alike.

Justice, fairness, mutual global responsibility should outweigh lumbering regulation. Chiquita and the rest do not depend desperately on that last little_slice of the European market the Caribbean producers do: If the big producers can sleep easy at night after lighting this ignoble cause by day, the same should not be true of responsible world leaders - least of all those who are in the habit of talking glibly of sin.

leave you with the words of the Hon Allen Alpian, Minister of Foreign Affairs for St Vincent and the Grenadines, a voicanic, mountainous chain of islands with neeligible natural resources. Its economy is slowing after 20 years' independence. The threat of losing the EU protection is worse, says the local newspaper, than La Soufrière volcano.

Mr Alpian says: "The recent WTO ruling has left us dazed and helpless. The concept of every man being his brother's keeper has been shattered. Can we survive? Would our cries for help go unheeded? What about neighbours? Are they deaf or uncaring? I know it now money and greed have been elevated to the status of a religion, and care and concern are now regarded as a vice. Our future is now on a life-support system. However, I am confident that our resourcefulness and faith will see us through."

Only the last sentence rings hollow, but politicians have to say the upbeat thing. Myself, I predict that no resourcefulness or faith will save this David if Goliath gets his way. Meanwhile, I read the labels on bananas with more than usual care. Corruption leaves a nasty taste.

'There is more to it than racism — the police have been deliberately kept in a state of infantilism by the Home Office' than 20 per cent of a policeman's

hat is wrong with the police? Since the Law-Y Y rence tragedy almost daily revelations underline problems relating not only to racism but to the culture, competence and accountability of this important public service. Why are you more than twice as likely to have your car stolen in Britain than in America, and why are you much more than twice as likely to have your house burgled?

It is astonishing that so few of us expect the police to solve the crime, or hope to retrieve our precious possessions. The clearup rate of indictable offences in Britain for each of our 127,000 policemen is ten cases a year out of possibly more than 50 million crimes. With such a pathetic performance, would you not expect the police and the Home Secretary to be called to numerous but if you go for a briefing to a local police headquarters, say in Andover, Peck-ham, or Guildford, as I have done with a former Home Secretary, the police will tell you they know exactly who the offenders are. They know the housing estates, the families, the

thugs and the yobs.

The police know a huge amount and they could know everything. But mention arrests and you will be given a variety of excuses: "We could pick them up. easy, if it was worth it, what with the paperwork and all, and the courts just letting the criminals off with a caution, and the shortage of staff."

As you drink tea and munch biscuits in Peckham headquarters with enormous policemen. you will be proudly shown, on video, pushers selling drugs in Peckham High Street - as they The explanations for this are apparently do every day. Why Tessa Keswick

You will also be shown the new, politically correct units manned by specialists 24 hours a day for battered and raped women. abused grannies and children and motoring offences.

Police morale plummeted in the early 1980s when the Police and Criminal Evidence Bill rightly hardened the evidence required for conviction and sought to protect the rights of suspects. But, over the years, a nervous Home Office, in the absence of reliable police management, has continued to pile paperwork on a hard-pressed service. Scores of performance indicators have ensured that a host of different duties, apart from solving crime, are required from the police.

In the 1990s the Conservatives attempted to loosen the umbilical cord linking the service to the Home Office by devolving power to the chief constables and making the solving of crime a priority. Targets were introduced and clear-up rates made explicit. But scores of daily "performance indicators" setting out centralised police duties required by the Home Office and the Police Inspectorate remained intact. These range from monitoring petry motoring offences to helping old ladies across the street and rescuing cats out of trees. A favourite requires the conduct of questionnaires with the public to establish police popularity levels.

Solving crime still takes up less

daily routine.

Over the years, fundamental changes have been considered— including an independent Police Inspectorate ensuring greater accountability and, to inspire better management, the introduction of an officer class drawn from university-educated profes-sionals (possibly ex-Army) to prevent the dreaded canteen culture rising through the ranks.

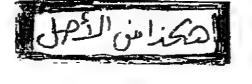

o combat rising crime, the separation of traffic duty and car crime to a less professional force was considered, together with a reduction in the number of "social duties" required. The introduction of performance-related pay was suggested. These useful initiatives, which should be revisited, were resisted by politicans, the Home Office or the police them-

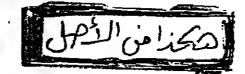

The police do a difficult job but they display all the hallmarks of a badly led, closed, public sector organisation. The setting up the Violent Crimes Task Force addresses only part of the problem. There is more to it than racism the police have been deliberately kept in a state of infantilism by the Home Office and have accepted this in exchange for flawed management structures and weak accountability.

In America, the public became so angry with rising crime that in the past 15 years it has dropped by half. We can do the same. The Home Secretary should grasp the problems of the management of the police force as a whole with honesty and realism — both sides would greatly benefit.

THE SECOND TEST

Can the eurozone become a flexible marketplace for jobs?

FIVE TESTS

A single currency, Tony Blair told the House of Commons last month, will not make Europe prosperous, but EMU "plus fundamental reform in labour, capital and product markets and in our welfare systems can do so". Maybe. But prosperity of this kind would also spring from those reforms without British membership of EMU. The implication that EMU is a necessary ingredient of success awaits, to put it very modestly, a firm degree of proof.

The United States has witnessed the creation of 13.5 million jobs since 1992: to some this might seem to help the case for a single currency. But, equally, since Britain was forced out of the ERM in 1992 and floated sterling, it has created more jobs than the rest of the eurozone put together. Unemployment is 4.5 per cent in the US, 6.2 per cent in Britain and 11 per cent across euroland.

The reasons why much of Europe continues to shed jobs. while America is creating a quarter of a million a month, are not far to seek. Employment in small and medium American enterprises is booming, thanks to a venture capital market which is ten times that of the EU's in terms of respective GDPs. Since Britain accounts for half the EU's venture capital investment, the real gap is wider still. The EU "social market". by contrast, continues to rely heavily on state intervention to create employment. Labour mobility is high in the US; in the EU, by contrast, only 1.7 per cent of those employed work outside their own country.

Is this culture changing? In EU councils, ministers acknowledge the need to liberalise labour markets and cut non-wage costs to price people into jobs; but, led by France and now Germany, most of the socialist majorities at the eurozone's core are heading in the opposite direction, intensifying labour market rigidities with mandatory cuts in working hours and overtime, job creation schemes that swell already oversized public sector payrolls, and state subsidies and tax breaks for private sector employers who take on the unemployed.

Such approaches have been considerably less effective than the welfare-to-work reforms deployed in smaller countries, for example, Denmark, The Netherlands and Spain. Ireland too has enjoyed labour market reforms but here the low-tax regime has been the decisive factor, with the advent of the euro, that is now under assault from Brussels, Bonn and Paris.

The expectation of most private economists that eurozone growth will slump to an average of 1.5 per cent this year is only partly linked to the loss of export markets in Asia and Rossia and weakening domestic consumer demand. Equally troubling is the resurgence of dirigiste structural policies. The 1999 budget drawn up by "Red" Oskar Lafontaine, the Finance Minister in Gerhard Schröder's coalition, is squeezing the pips of German industry as hard as Denis Healey did the rich in some 1,500 inquiries by crucial medium-sized companies - the FOR EUROPE Mittelstandbedrock of German manufacturing - on moving production out of the country completely.

Labour's tax-and-spend prime. The few steps the Kohl Government took to cut non-wage costs have effectively been suspended. As a result, the Federation of German Industry now reports

EU state subsidies to industry continue to distort investment to the time of more than £24 billion. France, along with Italy, is driving up its labour costs by imposing a 35-hour working week. Neither in Germany, nor France, nor Italy is unemployment expected to come down very significantly without far deeper structural reforms.

By making it easier to compare costs, both of labour and of government policies, across the eurozone, the euro helps to show how very divergent are its 11 economies. Supporters of a single currency hope that this will spur deregulation and other structural reforms; so far, it has produced a new drive for "harmonisation", for hobbling market forces in the name of eliminating "unfair" competition. For Britain to join EMU under these conditions would weaken its ability to resist pressure to co-ordinate taxes and labour costs and to sign up to restrictive labour practices. "Social Europe", the catch phrase of the continental Left, will be jobless Europe.

Until there is convincing evidence of the steep and sustainable fall in eurozone unemployment, with strong growth in private sector jobs, nothing could be less in the national interest than to tie Britain to the economics of the 1970s on which this country, 20 years ago, turned its back.

MR HAGUE'S KITCHEN

Realism and proportion on the Tory table

Two years after their defeat, many Tories remain in a state of denial. William Hague has never had any difficulty appreciating the magnitude of the change required if the Conservatives are to to be serious competitors at the next general election. Many of his parliamentary colleagues and much of the Conservative Party in the country have been less ready to acknowledge this reality. The Conservative leader seems now to be in the mood to impose his instincts on the Shadow Cabinet. As The Times reported yesterday, Mr Hague has adopted a new strategy entitled "kitchen table Conservatism", aimed at shifting the party's policies and style towards the core domestic issues that most influence the electorate. His seven "campaigning criteria" sound almost too obvious to be worth saying: use accessible language; listen to voters; emphasise the future; concede mistakes and move on; be for things not only against them; keep a sense of proportion in attacking Labour and insist upon integrity. But the two most important, the willingness to "concede and move on" and maintaining a sense of proportion, will also be the hardest. Only if enacted by the entire Tory leadership team, can they change the way Conservatism is put before voters in this year of many elections. This is the direction in which Mr Hague would now like to take his party. He is right. The most pertinent criticism is that the shift should have been made 18 months ago. Until the Conservatives can accept that mistakes were made in the past they invite the public to compare the record of the discredited Major era with that of Tony Blair and new Labour. Mr Hague needs instead to provoke public examination of the difference between new Labour's rhetoric and its record. He then needs to persuade voters that, under his charge, the Tories have solutions to their problems.

That process is not helped by exaggerated opposition. Constant calls for ministers to resign over minor misdemeanours only serves to remind the public that Conservative politicians were not often inclined to engage in principled resignation either.

If Mr Hague is to implement "kitchen table Conservatism" he needs to surround himself with kitchen table Conservatives. This is not solely a matter of removing those most intimately associated with the last Government, Michael Howard's decision to return to the backbenches soon does, however, allow Mr Hague additional room for manoeuvre. Some of the new blood that Mr Hague brought into the Shadow Cabinet last summer has been uninspiring. The Tory leader has certain talented women MPs at his disposal. Their advancement should be his priority when the time comes to reshuffle his colleagues.

Mr Hague has his first opportunity to demonstrate a sense of proportion today when he responds to the Budget. It would be entirely legitimate for him to draw attention to Gordon Brown's "stealth taxes" and the long-term impact that they may have on the economy. It would not be reasonable to predict financial meltdown as a result of the Chancellor's measures. Such a forensic approach might offend those "ivory tower Tories" for whom only an all-out assault on Labour is acceptable. These are not, though, the voters on whom a Conservative recovery is dependent.

THE THIRD RIGHT OF WAY

A dead end response to the right to roam

The Government is wandering towards an unnecessary rural dispute. Yesterday the Environment Minister, Michael Meacher, promised to fulfil his party's election pledge to introduce a statutory right of access to roughly four million acres of open countryside. Mr Meacher may hope that the promise of local access forums, to discuss how the law might be implemented, will soothe rural opinion. This Third

Way, though, risks pleasing no one. The Country Landowners Association (CLA) agrees that access should be improved. Its proposal for a National Voluntary Access Framework made sense. Over the past seven years, landowners have opened up an area twice the size of Nottinghamshire and created more than 12,000 miles of footpaths. Ministers have decided to ignore this success, and have chosen to wield a legislative walking stick. Rural opinion, still smouldering after the Government's handling of other countryside issues, is likely to be enflamed by such an initiative. Instead of ambling up the path of least resistance to a consensual solution, Mr Meacher has instead yomped towards confrontation. Where he has not aggravated opinion, he has left numerous questions unanswered. The Government has yet to map out precisely what land will be affected. "Further consideration" will be given about what to do if landowners or ramblers disagree about land being included or excluded. Crucially, the Government has decreed that there will be "no general right of compensation".

Lawyers not ramblers stand to gain most from Mr Meacher's proposal. The CLA believes that a statutory right of access, without appropriate compensation, will infringe the Protocol of the European Court of Human Rights. Some landowners, it claims, will tell ministers to take a hike to the courts to see this issue contested. The Government has created an aggrieved constituency which it intends to boss into submission. Consensus and co-operation, not the courts and confrontation, would have been the better way to proceed.

Anti-euro feeling as strong as ever

From Sir David Mitchell

Sir, The Government has stated that "the economic benefits [of joining the euro] must be clear and unambiguous". The Prime Minister has gone further and provided tests. The first of these is the "durable convergence of the UK business cycle with that of the eurozone" (leading article, February 24). Heads have duly nodded at this apparent truism, but will a homogenised trade cycle give either the UK or the eurozone unambiguous benefit? While the UK economy is buoyant, the eurozone benefits from raised exports and consequent jobs. When the non-convergent trade cycle moves on, we shall benefit from rising demand in the eurozone. To me, that seems a clear benefit from non-convergent trade cycles.

If we achieve the Prime Minister's first litmus test of durable convergence, a clear and unambiguous benefit will be lost. We shall all be buoyant together or all depressed together. Surely this scenario will be even worse, having lost the stabilising influence of compensating differences in the trade cycles within the EU.

Yours faithfully, DAVID MITCHELL (Conservative MP, 1964-97), Berry Horn Cottage, Odiham, Hampshire RG29 1HS. March 4.

From Mr M. J. C. Tweedie

Sir. Mr Tony Benn was right to ask the Prime Minister whether the Government would be making clear to every elector that "if Britain is a member of a single currency they will lose the right to elect or to remove on polling day those who make the economic decisions that affect our lives" (report, February 24).

British businessmen must ask themselves whether their interests are best represented by the views of the multinational-dominated CBI or the more questioning stance of the Institute of Directors and Business for Sterling.

Greater attention to the views of the two latter organisations would remove the CBI crutch on which Mr Blair appears to rely when he claims that his enthusiasm for the euro is matched by the majority of British businesses.

Yours faithfully, CHARLES TWEEDIE, Lower Upton, Little Hereford, Ludlow, Shropshire SY8 4BB.

From Mr James S. Little Sir. I congratulate you

editorial, "The first test", today. This is the first time that I have seen any public comment on the huge differ ence that exists between the social security costs of France, Germany and Italy and those of this country. and the implications of this difference upon future financial policy.

That this is a major issue of vast significance to the people of this country when the question of joining EMU is discussed there is no doubt, and more power to The Times for bringing it into the open.

Yours faithfully, JAMES S. LITTLE, Langdons, Swelling Hill, Ropley, Alresford, Hampshire SO24 0DA. March 3.

From Canon Edward Turner

Sir. In all the debates about the euro and the future of the EU, might I inject a theological/ethical note? In his first great book, Moral Man and Immoral Society (Charles Scribners Sons, 1932), the influential American thinker Reinhold Niebuhr explored the sharp distinction between the hopes and aspirations of the individual person as contrasted with the activities of groups, whether national, racial or economic (and I would add

Recognising that the distinction cannot be absolute, Niebuhr noted that the relationship between the individual and the community brings into intense focus the major problems and tensions of our age. It is in the light of this that Niebuhr argued that the Christian understanding of human nature may see the purpose of democracy as a way of providing a means for the use, diffusion and control of power.

The writings of Niebuhr on politics and justice could well be an invaluable resource for every person seeking to exercise power and influence in the EU, as well as in our own developing constitutional changes in the UK. Certainly a more vigorous, transparent and participative democracy is urgently required.

Yours sincerely, EDWARD TURNER, i King's Orchard. The Precinct, Rochester MEI ITG.

From Mr Roger Franklin

Sir. Since it is now absolutely clear that Mr Blair intends to take Britain into the euro, it is time that the British people cast aside their dislike of the Tories and united around a common belief in the value of the nation state. It would be a tragedy if it was to go down in history that Britain surrendered its independence, so hard won and fought for, because it could not forgive Tory sleaze.

Flying bishops are 'force for unity'

From the Suffragan Bishop of Richborough

Sir, It is very kind of the Modern Churchpeople's Union to suggest (letter, March 4) that I and my fellow "flying bishops" should be "reincorporated into the normal diocesan system". There are great attractions about acquiring the back-up staff of a diocese, the experts in such a range of specialities whom most dioceses em-

That, though, is not why we were consecrated. The Church of England, through the Archbishops, gave us a commission to ensure "extended pastoral care and sacramental ministry . . . be provided for the parishes which asked for it. This was to enable the Church of England to hold together diverse views over women's ordination for as long as was needed to reach

As the Archbishop of Canterbury's Commission on Communion and Women in the Episcopate put it (1988): The fact that a synod has reached a decision does not foreclose the matter." That was endorsed by last year's Lambeth Conference. It is not for pressure groups to try to invent a new Church of England in their own image, where you may believe whateyer you like, provided only that you accept that the ordination of women is Revealed Truth.

† EDWIN RICHBORO: 14 Hall Place Gardens, St Albans, Hertfordshire ALI 3SP.

From the Archdeacon of York

Sir, The former Archbishop of York, John Habgood, worked tirelessly to ensure that the deep divisions caused by the ordination of women to the priesthood in 1992 did not destroy the unity of the Church of England. The Act of Synod was the result, enabling many to remain peaceably and often in friendship with those with whom they could never agree on this issue. But it was also an opportunity to show to a divided society and world that Christians could have fundamental disagreements and yet remain in an otherwise good and loving relation-promises of even-handedness to both sides that were part of the initial bargain. Even so, it is better than the hurt and division and rejections which would have ensued without the provisions of the Act of Synod.

Of course it is a fragile unity, for many bishops have deliberately and systematically flouted or ignored the

It is desperately sad that Nicholas Henderson and Monica Furlong, the authors of your letter, are working equally tirelessly to destroy what has been achieved. One is forced to wonder who will be next on their list if opponents of the ordination of women are ejected from the Church, Perhaps it will be those who hold to traditional Christian doctrine with a firmness which must surely be anathema to the Modern Churchpeople's Union.

GEORGE AUSTIN. North Back House, Main Street, Wheldrake, York YO19 6AG.

From the Reverend John F. H. Shead Sir, It is not just that many of us have "difficulty" with the ordination of women; before the vote in 1992 it was made plain that we could not accept that this action was right.

The Act of Synod has enabled us to remain and function as priests within the Church which nurtured us in the faith and enabled us to share in Christ's priestly ministry. It has also enabled us to continue to work within current diocesan structures, but having a bishop of our own integrity to whom we can turn when necessary.

To rescind the Act of Synod would, I am sure, do great damage. We have lost some fine priests, who have felt that they could no longer function in a Church which has turned its back on its Catholic and apostolic roots. Do we really want to lose many more?

I write as an ordinary parish priest who, whilst having a high regard for the ministry of women, cannot accept that it is right to ordain them as

From Dr Michael J. Harte

Sir, For the record, Lord Denning did not urge "dockworkers" unions to sue the Government over docks privatisation" (Obituary, March 6).

During the House of Lords debates on the Dockyard Services Bill in 1986, opponents of the scheme to introduce commercial management into Devonpurt and Rosyth aroused his interest. He felt that the protection given to the workforce through European regulations - under which the unions had the right to go to court after any transfer and seek two weeks' pay as compensation for inadequate consultation - was insufficient. He therefore proposed that the unions should have the right to go to court to stop the transfer process if they felt there had not been full consultation. As the Under-Secretary in the Ministry of Defence responsible for the transfer, it was both a privilege and a pleasure to work with Lord Denning and watch him, with the greatest consideration and courtesy, break government ministers over a barrel to cure an amendment to the Bill. Subsequently, it was a matter of regret to him that the unions then abused the power he had secured for tion with the MoD. Instead they went to the High Court to seek to stop the transfer process at the eleventh hour. There Michael Beloff, QC, who wrote warmly about Lord Denning in his article (March 6), had no difficulty in convincing Mr Justice Millett that the Secretary of State for Defence had no case to answer. The transfer therefore went ahead as planned.

French policy in Africa

From the Ambassador of France

Sir, The act of barbarism perpetrated in Uganda against Western tourists - which the French Government has unequivocally condemned - is too heinous for it to be seized on in order to make harsh, unjust and inaccurate comments about our country's policy (report, "Hatred rooted in colonial struggle", March 4). It is, in particular, totally wrong to assert that France ignored the UN embargo on arms supplies to Rwanda, when, as we have already said (letter, March 13, 1997), France stopped sending any military hard-ware to Rwanda before the UN ban was imposed.

I also want to reiterate that, ever since the onset of the Rwandan crisis, France has made every effort to promote a political solution.

I am surprised at your correspond-

Third World debt

From Mr Peter Ball

Sir, Recently I have assisted in the presentation of several seminars and workshops addressed to the investigating authorities, lawyers and bankers of Kenya and Uganda on the subject of banking frauds investigation management.

On occasion, the subject of the servicing of international debts has arisen; I am finding it increasingly difficult to offer, let alone defend, the view that such debts should be serviced and eventually repaid. My hosts are far too polite to cause me embarrassment, and discussion usually peters out inconclusively.

I have searched in vain for an understandable and moral defence for the current Western capitalist view. ent's remarks regarding the relations between Britain and France in Africa. The best proof of this lies in the joint visit which, this week, our two countries' Foreign Ministers will be paying to Ghana and Côte d'Ivoire where, in line with the decision of last December's Anglo-French summit in Saint-Malo, they will be chairing the first joint meeting of UK and French Ambassadors in Africa.

Council cuts close precious museums

From the Chairman of National Heritage Sir, The news that Cheltenham Borough Council has decided to close two local museums, the Gustav Holst Birthplace Museum and the Costume Museum at the Pittville Pump Room. will freeze the marrow of every museum curator dependent on local authority funding. Holst was born in 1874 at 4 Clarence Road, one of the town's smaller Regency-style houses (it was built in 1832), and the house remained in private hands until 1974, when it was bought by the Holst Birthplace Trust, with the help of the borough council, and turned into a museum which contains many items associated with this great English composer, including his grand piano, and a vividly presented account of his life and work. The Costume Museum is quite different, but also a model small enterprise of its kind. It was opened in 1983 to display some of the fine collection of costumes, dating mainly from the 18th century, and hitherto stored in the town's main Art Gallery and Museum, complemented by the Hull Grundy jewellery collection. It is housed on the upper floors of the splendid Grade I listed Pittville Pump

The Holst Museum is to be kept "as an educational resource", meaning apparently that it will be opened occasionally for school parties by prior appointment. The Costume Museum is to be dismantled by May of this year, and the rooms above the Pump Room will be hired out for

The problem, of course, is money. The Liberal Democrat majority on the council was faced with a budget deficit and has put the squeeze on the leisure department, an amorphous conglomerate of responsibilities that includes hanging baskets, playbuses, and Christmas lights as well as what we might have hoped were more permanent structures - such as museums and galleries that bring in visitors as well as providing an educational and cultural service to the inhabitants of Chehenham.

Yours faithfully, JAMES BISHOP, Chairman, National Heritage, 9a North Street, SW4 0NH.

Origins of the kilt

From Mr Jain Navlor

Sir, I would disagree with Mr Aitken Fyall (letter, March 3) on the origins of the kilt. Whilst he mentions Hugh Trevor-Roper's point that its creation is attributable to an English Quaker from Furness, circa 1730, a glance at the Arms of Skene of Skene of 1672, reveals that the left-hand supporter wore trews and the right-hand a kilt. Let us promote the use of the kilt for the new millennium with the Scottish parliament in Edinburgh giving an inspired lead.

Yours faithfully, IAIN NAYLOR, Learmonth Terrace. Edinburgh EH4 IPG. March 3.

From Dr Bruce L. Lees

Sir, I have always thought it somewhat Ironic that the kilt should now he seen as the national dress of Scotland when its origins seemed to lie in the Highlands which were hated and feared by the rest of Scotland until the 18th century.

However, that view may be quite wrong. I have a friend who is the epitome of a West Highlander; he lives and works where his family have always lived and worked. Recently we were looking at photographs of his daughter's wedding in the West Highlands. Amongst the groom (the English-born son of Lowland Scottish parents), the best man, and other male guests, all wearing kilts, he stood out by being dressed in a dark erev suit When I asked him why this was he replied, with some scorn, that kilts were "skirts for Englishmen!"

Yours faithfully, BRUCE LEES. Hayfield, Bournefields, Twyford, Winchester, Hampshire SO21 1NY. March 3.

Reception The Lord Chief Justice was the guest of honour at a reception of the Parliamentary and Legal Commit-tee of the Guild of Editors held last night at Bloomsbury House.

THE first woodlarks are back over the heaths and commons where they will nest, and their song pours down from the sky. It is a more melodious song than the skylark's. with a recurrent nightingale-like ohrase, and the lark sweens in large circles over its territory as it sings. Wondlarks have increased in numbers in the past ten years: they are commonest in Surrey and Hamoshire, and in Eust Anglia. and are very tame birds on the ground. Large flocks of curiews are moving north along the coasts on their way back to the moors: they utter their wild, trilling song as they go. In gardens, goldfinches are singing again: their spring

Nature notes song is a more elaborate form of their everyday musical twitter.

More early flowers are opening: aloneside field paths there are Buxbaum's speedwells with their hairy stems and fragile, pale blue flowers, while in ditches and by woodsides there are hooded purple blossoms on the sweet-smelling ground ivy. Snowdrops are in full flower, with sheets of them like snow on some wooded hillsides. Leaf-buds are breaking on crab-ap-ple trees and elder bushes, and dul) red flower clusters are appearing along the elm twigs.

An earlier Nature notes was published in error vesterday.

Joe DiMaggio, baseball player, died yesterday aged 84. He was born on November 25, 1914.

lthough baseball's annual championship is called the World Series, Joe DiMaggio's heroic status is hard to convey to non-Americans for whom the sport remains a mystery. Outsiders would have somehow to imagine a figure who combined the romantic aura of Stanley Matthews, the car-like grace of Gary Sobers and the self-effacing sportsmanship of Henry Cooper.

DiMaggio - known alternately as the "Yankee Clipper" and "Joltin' Joe" - exemplified the fusion of sport and celebrity. A star of the all-conquering New York Yankees team between 1936 and 1951, he achieved even greater fame in retirement when he became the second husband of Marilyn Monroe.

The marriage ended in acrimony within a year, but the couple subsequently rekindled their friendship, and the lac-onic, publicity-shy DiMaggio remained a father-like presence in her turbulent private life until her death in 1962.

By the end of his life he had attained something akin to a secular sainthood — one jour-nalist dubbing him "the last American knight". Ernest Hemingway, one of the player's old drinking companions, wove his name into the novella The Old Man and the Sea: "! would like to greet the great DiMaggio fishing. They say his father was a fisherman. Maybe he was as poor as we are and would understand." DiMaggio was also used as a symbol of the slipping away 17, easily passing the previous In 1943 DiMaggio enlisted of the American dream, in one run of 44 games set in 1897. in the US Air Force, where he

The son of a Sicilian-born fisherman, Joseph Paul Di-Maggio was born into a large and strict Roman Catholic family in Martinez, northern California. Even though their father called it "a burn's game", two of his brothers, Vincent and Dominic, also went on to careers in Major League baseball.

Tall and lean, DiMaggio joined the San Francisco Seals before finishing high school, and four years later, at 21, he signed with a Yankees side that was still coming to terms with life without the newly retired Babe Ruth.

Playing alongside legends such as Lou Gehrig, DiMag-gio soon established himself as a star outfielder, his apparently effortless pace earning him his "Clipper" nickname. A potent striker of the ball too, he helped the Yankees to victory in the World Series in three consecutive seasons from 1936. All told, he played in ten World Series, and won the accolade of the American League's Most Valuable Player in 1939, 1941 and 1947. Perhaps his greatest achieve-ment of all came in 1941, in what became known as "The Streak". Over the course of 56 games he maintained an un-

but after a sub-standard season in 1946, he was almost traded to another team. The next year he was back to his best form, scoring two home runs as the Yankees took another World Series.

The 1949 season fin which he became the first player to break the $100,000 barrier) proved the stuff of legend. After missing more than 60 games with a foot injury, he

He returned to phenomenal batting carrying baseball at the end of the war, the Yankees to league victory over the Boston Red Sox in the final two games of the season. In a crucial game against the Red Sox, he hit four home runs in three games, and went on to score two home runs in the World Series victory over the Brooklyn Dodgers. He was to end his career with a 325 batting average and a tally of no fewer than 361

DiMaggio took charge of the funeral arrange ments, barring Hollywood figures - including Monroe's former lovers Frank Sinatra and Peter Lawford from the simple, dignified service. Her third husband, Arthur Miller, also stayed away. In later years DiMaggio pointedly avoided even mentioning her name in public, but he had roses delivered every week to the Los Angeles grave.

The following decades were relatively uneventful. DiMaggio quietly accumulated more business endorsements but lived largely away from the public gaze, surfacing briefly for lucrative autograph sessions or to pitch balls at opening days at Yankee Stadium. He gave few interviews, and lived alone in Florida, also spending a great deal of time with his sister in San Francisco. He devoted time to fundraising for the Florida children's hospital that bears his name.

Geoffrey Moore, Professor of American Literature at Hull University, 1962-82, died on February 5 aged 78. He was born in Mitcham, Surrey, on June 10, 1920.

ONE of the founders of American Studies as a subject in British universities during the 1950s. Geoffrey Moore was also a poet, novelist, critic and. broadcaster. In 1954 he published The Penguin Book of Modern American Verse, but his magnum opus - at 1,328 pages - was American Literature: A Representative Anthology of American Writing from Colonial Times to the Present

Born in London, Geoffrey Herbert Moore saw wartime service in the RAF before reading English at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, where he took a first in 1947. An appointment as instructor in English at the University of Wisconsin was followed by time as a visiting professor at the universities of Tulane, Kansas City and New Mexico. Returning to Britain in the early 1950s, Moore was a regular anonymous contributor to The Times Literary Supplement, and an editor and producer for BBC Television.

In the mid-1950s his senior lectureship in American literature at Manchester University was the first full-time post in the subject at a British university. In 1962 he was appointed Professor of American Litera-ture and head of the new Department of American Studies at the University of Hull, holdings of American literature from virtually nothing. He also helped to create an innovative syllabus, which increasingly attracted student applicants as well as visiting

American Fulbright scholars. The introduction of a fouryear single honours degree programme, which included a year's study at one of several major American universities. also owed much to his enthusiasm and range of friendships and contacts in the American groves of academe. Many of these friends - notably James Baldwin, Robert Lowell and Mary McCarthy - also visited Hull

Following his retirement in 1982, Moore continued to lecture on the essential "American-ness" of American literature to appreciative international audiences. Even in these later years, it could be said of him (as Peter Parish once said of Harry Allen) that he had "an infinite capacity for taking planes". He also became ediwhere in 20 years he built up the Brynmor Jones Library's the works of Henry James, and reviewed for the Financial Times. An engaging if sometimes acerbic figure, Moore, in his own telling, relished the "bright lights of London", the company of intelligent and attractive women (his mar-ringe to Pamela Marguerite was dissolved in 1962), the exhilaration of driving high-powered cars, and the dubious comforts of health farms. He leaves a daughter in Oxford and a son in California.

Peter Cole, former television news executive. died of heart failure on March 6 aged 66. He was born on April 26, 1932.

IT WAS a quiet news day on May 30, 1968, when Peter Cole was manning the home news desk on News at Ten in Television House, Kingsway, London. His phone rang and a voice said: "I'm Cecil King. I have just been sacked jas chairman of International Publishing Corporation, owners of Mirror Newspapers]. I am coming round to be interviewed.

Suspecting a hoax. Cole phoned back to King's office and verified the caller's identity. ITN broke into afternoon horse racing on ITV with a newsflash. And that is how the world - and Daily Mirror executives - learnt about the dramatic departure of the powerful newspaper owner. Peter Cole was born in Whitchurch, Shropshire, and worked as a journalist on the Rhondda Leader, the Merthyr editor of ITN's election night

Cole in 1996, in retirement from News at Ten Express and the Western Mail in Cardiff. His television career began at TWW, the ITV contractor for Wales and the West, where he worked variously as news editor, reporter and sports commentator, specialising in boxing. He joined ITN as news editor in 1964, three years before the birth of News at Ten. In the 1970s he took on a special assignment as news results programmes - The Nation Decides, anchored by Alastair Burnet. He was given the task of ensuring that ITN's service of individual constituency results would be faster than the BBC's. He positioned a stringer in nearly every constituency (more than 600). He kept in close touch with all of them, urged them to make personal contact with every returning

installed dedicated telephones so that the correspondents could phone a special number in the election studio and pass on the flash result to Burnet. ITN became renowned for its faster service on election night. and that owed a lot to Cole's original system.

In June 1986 a freelance cameraman, George De'Ath, on assignment for ITN in the African township of Crossroads, near Cape Town, was caught between two tribal factions waging war and murdered. Cole, then an editorial executive, flew to Cape Town with a colleague, Norman Rees, and took charge of the complex arrangements that followed. They were almost immediately in trouble with the South African authorities for not having proper visas. They comforted De Ath's family and kept in touch with the South African police, who were seeking the killers, though no one was ever charged. Later Cole and Rees organised a memorial service,

members of the international media. Cole, on behalf of ITN, set up an endowment at a technical college to fund an annual prize for aspiring cameramen, commemorating De' Ath's name.

The following year he was in action again in Zimbabwe when an ITN stringer was locked up as a suspected South African spy. Cole convinced the authorities that the stringer's scoop (about a South African raid on Zambia) was good journalism, not espionage: the man was released. Cole retired in 1989 as senior news editor. He loved France (he was an accomplished cook) and he and his family were regular visitors to their house in the Garonne area. In retirement he worked in the media department of the Soldiers', Sailors' and Airmen's Families Association, and as a media consultant.

Peter Cole was a decent man, loyal to colleagues and dedicated to high journalistic standards. He is survived by his wife Diana, and by a son.

MAJOR DONALD HENDERSON

Major Donald Henderson, GM, bomb disposal expert, died on January 30 aged 71. He was born on December 12, 1921.

IN A career of 17 years in the Explosives Office of the Metropolitan Police, Donald Henderson regularly faced death from terrorist hombs. At Christmastime in 1974, at the height of an IRA bombing campaign, he was called out to no lewer than

72 incidents in eight nights. But the exploit that won him his George Medal probably represented Henderson's closest brush with death. One evening in 1975, in the middle of a spate of bombings, murder and attempted murder orchestrated by an IRA unit which came to be known as the Balcombe Street gang. Henderson was called to Locken's Restaurant, in Marsham Street, near the House of Commons, where a clientele which included a number of MPs was dining. Police had spotted a holdall wedged between a window of the restaurant and an iron grille. The building was cleared and Henderson, who knew that this type of device had a very short delayed action, ran towards the bomb, keeping parked cars between him and the holdall until the last possible moment. The bomb, which consisted of 25lb of high explosive at the core of a packing of heavy screws, was to be irriggered by a simple pocket watch. Sizing up the situation in a moment, Henderson cut the wires leading to the detonator and threw the holdall containing the bomb down on to the pavement. When he later inspected it he found that there were only a few seconds left on the timer.

At the trial of the Balcombe

Street gang - so named London in the 1970s both he because they were eventually arrested after holding a couple hostage at their flat in Balcombe Street, Marylebone the judge praised Henderson for his courage in the face of the risks he faced almost daily.

Donald Victor Henderson had come to the Met from the Army which he had joined as a Territorial shortly before the Second World War. After the war he was commissioned in the Royal Army Ordnance Corps as a munitions officer and served in Hong Kong. Korea, Aden and Germany before his retirement in 1904.

That year he joined the Met and with an old friend, Major Geoffrey Biddle (also to win the George Medal for defusing a bomb under Edward Heath's car), set up its Explosives Office at Cannon Row police station. During the escalation of IRA activity in and Biddle were kept busy defusing explosive devices of all types. Henderson was also personally responsible for checking the safety of St Paul's Cathedral for the wedding of the Prince of Wales. He was much in demand as a lecturer on explosive devices to other police forces throughout the world, notably the FBI.

In retirement, from 1981, he wrote a number of books, among them Bomb Two. This was a novel which embodied much realistic detail about the technical problems and mental strains confronting the bomb disposal officer.

Henderson's first Joan, died in 1981. In 1983 he married Maisie, whom he and Joan had known from their Service days in Aden. She died in 1994 and he is survived by the two daughters and two sons of his first marriage.

HUNTING: The earthstopper's duty

FROM DUR HUNTING CORRESPONIHINT

THE fox shares with the modern young lady the two-fold cult of speed and slimness. indeed he only survives on hunting days by means of one or the other; making use of his speed above ground or his slimness in some narrow subterranean retreat. It really is amazing into what a tiny hole a full-grown for can creep. Some say that where his mask will go the rest of him will follow. It is certain that countless foxes in extremis have squeezed into 6-inch pipes or wormed their way down rabbit boks even smaller than that. But luckily the earthstopper is not normally expected to deal with foxes with such mildence in their own compressibility.

Technically, earthstopping is of two varieties — stopping and putting to. In those coverts which the hounds are going to draw, each earth must be "stopped" during the previous night, while the foxes are out harting for food. Then when they are wanted that the foxes are wanted to be a forest that the foxes are wanted that the foxes are wanted to be a forest to be forest to be a forest to be a forest to be a forest to be a fore they should be found above ground, perhaps curied up near the earth. It is usual to advise that this work should be done between 9 and topm for the tradition of going early to bed still lingers in the country, and it is not much use suggesting a later hour. On a stormy night, of course, there is a danger that the foxes may still be underground at that time and may be stopped in — after a rough night foxes were hard to find." There is also a danger that the earthstopper may take an equal dislike to the weather, may put off his duties until the early morning, and allow his stopping to degenerate into "putting-to." Any earthstopping done on the morning of the meet is called putting-to. It is no help as regards finding force, as it is more likely to stop a for in than out, but if well arranged it succeeds in keeping forces from running to ground before they have gone a reasonable distance from home.

ON THIS DAY

This relic of Times past, when the sports pages reported at length on hunt meets, explains how the hunt's earthstopper would block holes in which a hunted fox might take cover.

Of course it is not possible to stop every rabbit-hole into which a fox could crawl. But all earths which foxes use and in which they breed must be regularly stopped and regularly unstopped. Drains are a most pernicious form of shelter and as many as possible should be closed with gratings (at any rate between November I and March I), care being taken to see that they are untenanted when the gratings are fixed. Any other adventitious hole which saves a hunted fox should he dug out at the earliest opportunity or "stunk out" at intervals with lar or renardine.

Holes which foxes are not intended to use cannot be treated too severely. But main earths should be disturbed as little as is consistent with efficient stopping. It is not enough to push two or three branches down each hole, of which one or two are subsequently pulled out. The correct way is to make a laggot of the right size for each hole and to keep it, with a stake, under a convenient tree. It is then the work of a moment to put the faggot into the mouth of the hole and to push the stake through it into the ground, holding it firm against foxes or even badgers. It is equally easy to pull out the stake and the faggot, leaving the earth undamaged and untainted... ute noi out wh Ge fee

Investor confidence rebounds

By Alasdair Murray ECONOMICS CORRESPONDENT

THE Chancellor received a big boost before today's Bud-get as a new survey reported a record jump in confidence among City investors. Economic data published yesterday also added to the impression that the economy is set to avoid outright recession and en-sure that Gordon Brown remains on track to meet his tough borrowing rules.

The Merrill Lynch Gallup

survey of UK fund managers, which was published yester-day, revealed the sharpest jump in confidence in the survey's nine-year history. The number of investors expecting an improved economic situation over the next 12 months doubled to 67 per cent between February and March.

It was the first time in 18 months that a majority of fund managers have expected an overall improvement in the economy and compares with a low of 3 per cent in September.
The improved optimism is also clear in a marked upgrade to corporate earnings predictions with 1999 earnings now expected to rise by 2.9 per cent, compared with an expected 0.8 per cent in January, and reach 6.5 per cent next year. The manufacturing sector unexpectedly returned to growth in January while the British Retail Consortium monthly sales figures showed retail sales maintaining modest growth in the traditionally weak month of February. The monthly GDP estimate

Research also hinted that the economy has now reached the bottom - without recording an outright decline in GDP and that growth is to pick up again in the coming months. Mr Brown has been under pressure to reduce his growth assumptions, which at be-tween I and 1.5 per cent are well above the City consensus, However, the string of posiwith the Bank of England's aggressive rate-cutting stance has boosted hopes that the economy is set to achieve a soft landing and eased the pressure on Mr Brown to make embarrassing revisions to his forecasts in today's Budget,

Official data showed manufacturing output climbed by 0.1 per cent between December and January, bolstering hopes that the struggling sec-tor may have reached the bottom at last. The annual rate of growth, however, continued to show a decline, falling by 0.9 percentage points from a year ago, while overall industrial cline of 6.4 per cent was the smallest for a year, ago, while overall industrial markets yesterday output also fell by 0.5 per cent in January, compared with December, as the warm weather cut energy output. Manufacturers also received a boost from the producer prices data which showed that the sector is just avoiding out-right price deflation. Factory gate prices rose by 0.2 per cent in February compared with no change in January, Input prices continued to fall in February, although the annual de-stuck to the consensus that the Budget will take a neutral stance, with shares and the pound barely moving throughout the day. The FISE 100 index closed up just 3.3 points or 0.05 per cent higher at 6,208.8.

Retailers store wars 'are phoney'

- BEY PURVES

By Sarah Cunningham RETAIL CORRESPONDENT

SUPERMARKETS stood accused of staging a phoney price war yesterday as Asda launched a new pricing cam-paign but admitted that most of the cost would come from its existing marketing budget.

Tesco's price campaign, launched two weeks ago, also came with an assurance to the City that profit forecasts need not be altered.

A Tesco spokesman yesterday declined to say how much its price campaign would cost the company. Somerfield, the fifth-largest supermarket group, also an-nounced £200 million worth of cuts yesterday. The campaigns have been launched as the Office of Fair Trading prepares to pubquiry into the sector.

Asda said yesterday that it was cutting the price of 1,000 items, with a further 3,000 cuts to come by the end of this year. However, the company admitted that there would have to be price rises among the 20,000 lines that it stocks, partly because manufactorers are raising their prices. Asda is also cutting back on its number of "buy one, get one free offers in order to fund the price cuts. Asda said that about £150 million of the £200 million investment will come from existing promotional spend. Analysts said that most of the balance would come from the company's annual budget for price cuts. Shares in the leading super markets eased yesterday. J Sainsbury was worst hit with a fall of 81/p to 3524p. Andrew Fowler, food retail analyst at Morgan Stanley, said food retailers were in danger of driving down their stock market valuations to the point hat they were vulnerable to takeover by foreign players.

"PR hype is all well and good but the companies have to understand that it does bring a cost. The valuations of these companies are frightningly low, largely because of the headlines about price wars. In reality it is merely marketing, and in line with their strategies," he said. Another analyst said that sales at Saseway and J Sainsbury, neither of which have announced price initiatives, are likely to be hit by the Asda and Tesco campaigns.

The free publicity is hurting the others, but I am taking it with a pinch of salt," he said.

Deal with watchdogs saves Intel from trial

Dawes to net £75m from sale of MDT to Cellnet

By Raymond Snoddy MEDIA EDITOR

MARTIN DAWES, the telecoms entrepreneur, will net more than £75 million from the sale of his mobile phone business to Cellnet, it emerged yesterday.

Cellnet, jointly owned by BT and Securicor, has paid £130 million for Martin Dawes Telecommunications (MDT), the largest independent mobile phone service provider in the UK. Directors and senior managers will share £14.3 million in respect of their 11 per cent shareholding.

Based in Warrington and with a staff of 1,300, the business will give Cellnet access to more than 800,000 mainly corporate and small business customers, with a strong presence in the North West. MDT also is retail outlets and inre call centres

Yesterday's deal represents a setback for Vodafone, Cellnet's main rival, which has a 20 per cent stake in MDT and most MDT customers subscribe to a Vodafone service. Mr Dawes, who launched his business in television rental before diversifying into mobile phones, is little known outside his industry. He will now turn his attention to developing Internet interests. MDT will be run by David Goldie, the current managing director.

MDT has offices in Europe. Australia and South America and alliances set up with companies including the Co-operative Bank, Telstra, Scottish Telecom. Opai Telecom and

Gokal was also ordered to pay £2.9 million out of his personal

One of the main grounds of appeal centres on the circumstances in which Gokal, who was arrested in Germany, was

they handed out £12.5 million to soothe the feelings of Jim Fifield. Now they are proffering an £800,000 farewell gift to Sir Colin Southgate, as he heads off to spend more time with his opera house. And who should take Sir Colins well-reconstruct place? Colin's well-remunerated place? After employing headhunters to scour the world, the EMI directors plumped for Eric Nicoli. Well, they all know Eric, since he is one of their number, and he could do with a break after all those years labouring at United Biscuits. There were even suggestions that he might soon be in need of a new job if UB shareholders had their way. So who better for the top job?

The stock market, alas, is not as kind-hearted as the EMI board. News of Eric Nicolits appointment resulted in United Biscuits shares rising and EMIs.

cuits shares rising and EMI's heading in the opposite direc-tion. If Mr Nicoli succeeds in doing for the music company what he has done for UB, then EMI's share price is set to underperform the market even more drastically than it has been doing. It is not for nothing that City wags are apt to abbreviate the UB

chief executive's name to E-coli.
But the latest chapter in the EMI saga is no laughing matter. That Sir Colin Southgate should be receiving another year's salary from the company is the sort of corporate lunacy that inves-tors ought to rise up against. The company was struggling when Sir Colin decided that he could not resist the lure of the Royal Opera House. He took some per suading that he could not be both chairman and effective chief exec-utive of EMI whilst also trying to sort out the most appalling man-agement and financial chaos that had been allowed to develop at Covent Garden. Eventually, how-ever, he was persuaded that there had to be new leadership at

No crumbs of comfort for EMI

This would not have been such a problem were it not for the way that the succession issue at EMI had been so badly bungled, a mess for which Sir Colin must take much of the responsibility.

Almost handing over the chief executive baton to Jim Fifield only to withdraw it at the last moment was a costly mistake.

Now the company has decided that it really does not need a chief executive when it has two such excellent divisional bosses. What it needs is a man of strategic vision and leadership. To those who have watched UB crumble under his eight-year reign as chief executive, this does not sound like Eric Nicolì. But at least there will be someone sitting in the chair that Sir Colin is voluntarily vacat-ing. But why should Sir Colin be paid to go? His contract has an-other year to run but it was only ever expected that he would have to fulfil the two years if it took that long to find a successor. He has promised to make himself available to offer advice to Mr Nicoli, who will certainly need it, but the price seems high even for Sir Colin's consultancy.

Brown faces the simplicity test

I J ise Chancellors know when to take a rest. If Gordon Brown needed any further evidence that he should deliver a short, broadly neutral Budget today, it was sup-plied by the latest tidings from Britain's factories. Output has turned up but so, unfortunately, have suppliers' prices. It probably does not mean much, except that this is not the moment to panic about the economy.

The Treasury has been more optimistic than most and still wants to show enough responsibility to encourage the Bank of England to keep cutting short-term interest rates freely. The Ex-chequer surplus seems to be run-ning more than £3 billion higher than the £4.3 billion forecast in November. It should stay above that in 1999-2000 on present poli-cies, so there is not the slightest excuse for fiscal tightening.

Pre-ordained real duty increases on petrol and tobacco should provide enough extra revenue to cut some taxes. For the sake of simplicity and incentives, it should go to raising the basic tax-free income allowance for all nearer to the level implied by the minimum wage in the spirit of the minimum wage.
Instead, unless the pre-Budget

hints have been more than usually misleading, our driven Chancellor will surely bring in a series of complex tax cuts carefully targeted at deserving groups, such as millionaire high-tech entrepre-neurs, at the expense of a series of new tax measures against anti-social people, such as motor-

A good if rough and ready way to judge any Budget is to weigh up whether it makes the tax system simpler and more equal for all or more complex, likely to dis-tort people's behaviour and breed loopholes faster than the old ones can be closed.

Last year Mr Brown reformed

capital gains tax to make it more penal and much more complex. This year, he is likely to offer new concessions for those who hired the most convincing lobbyists. A good reform of inheritance tax would slash the top rate to 20 per cent to maximise revenue. A bad one will try to stop people es-caping to maximise punishment. As the Liberals' Malcolm

Bruce and almost any tax expert will agree, introducing another would be daft. Better to cut existing rates. Best to boost the tax-free allowance for all. New Labour thinks that if you are clever enough, you can cut taxes without benefiting those who pay most. That way lies tax madness and a corrupt economy.

Uncomfortable deal at Chesterfield

hareholders in Chesterfield. the property company, may be about to lose their chief executive — but only if they vote in favour of a deal that will offer him the chance to run his own, potentially very lucrative, management company.

Robert Maxted has not had a glorious reign at Chesterfield, with the share price ebbing away even faster than the net asset value. Now the company has hit on the idea of breaking itself up. A chunk is to be sold to GE Capital of the United States, and Mr Maxted has agreed a deal with GE whereby his new company will manage the portfolio. He will also look after another couple of sites being sold to De-lancey Estates. Mr Maxted is sensibly not resigning his post at Chesterfield unless shareholders vote through the property sales.

The prices are, we are assured, those that Healey & Baker, the valuer, put on the properties at the end of last year: neither GE nor Delancey are being granted spe-cially favourable deals. It would be quite wrong to think that Mr Maxted was gaining undue bene-fit from the arrangement. On the contrary, although the company would not dream of saying such a thing publicly, it might portray the deal as a clever way of extricating the chief executive without the nuisance of having to pay a hefty

Inchcape says Asian recovery a year away

INCHCAPE, the international vehicle distributor, handed down a worrying prognosis yesterday for companies reliant on South-East Asian markets, saying the first signs of an economic recovery in the region were still at least one year

Peter Johnson, who will be the company's next chief executive, said Asian economies were bouncing along the bottom of the cycle. Mr Johnson, currently head of Inchcape's vehicle division, painted the bleak outlook after Inchcape, whose chairman is Lord Marshall of Knights-bridge, unveiled a £297.6 million pre-tax loss for 1998, down from an £89.6 million profit previously.

Edington quits BAA over listing decision

By CARL MORTISHED

BAA'S group property direc-tor quit the board yesterday following last week's decision to scrap plans for a separate stock market listing for Lynton, the company's property development arm.

Gordon Edington, who was chief executive of Lynton when it was sold to BAA in 1989, said he would not seek a new role in property but would focus on his family assets and charitable interests.

The airports group was considering the flotation of the non airport-related property assets, totalling some £600 million with Mr Edington at the helm. However, BAA decided against the move, in part due to the poor market perception of property shares.

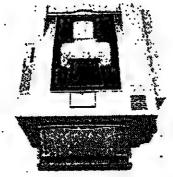

Mr Edington, 53, is to be replaced as managing director of Lynton by Andrew Jurenko, currently finance director of the property subsidiary.

BAA said yesterday that a separate statement would be made in the annual report concerning any compensation for Mr Edington. He is on a twoyear contract and was paid a salary of £240,000 per year in 1998, which could entitle him to £480,000 in compensation.

Mr Edington is president of the British Property Federation and in addition to running BAA's property business. was chairman of BAA International, developing the company's overseas airport business.

Pre-Budget nerves keep investors on sidelines

CITY investors were cautious ahead of today's Budget. Hopes that Wall Street could extend last week's record-breaking run and provide London with fresh impetus proved wide of the mark. As a result. share prices found the going difficult with investors happy, instead, to contemplate what the Chancellor may have in store. The market reversed an early 31-point fall before closing little changed on the day. The FTSE 100 index finished 3.3 up at 6.208.8 in thin trading that saw just 946 million shares change hands. The FTSE 250 index put on 10.8 at 5.359.2.

It was the first day of official trading in South African Breweries, with the price frothing 20p to 485p having started trading last week on the grey market at the equiva-lent of the 428p being quoted on the Johannesburg stock market. Almost 25 million shares had changed hands. At these levels, the brewer is valued at almost £4 billion, which means it will be automatically catapulted into the top 100 companies when the steering committee meets tomorrow.

Bid talk was responsible for a rise of 8tap to 51tap in London Forfaiting. A total of 1.28 million shares were traded with some of the buying said to have originated in the US. This has led to claims that a bid of at least 120p a share is being lined up which would value the business at £126 million.

Inn Business, the tenanted pub group, ticked up 5p to 631:p on rumours that a recent approach from Enterprise Inos may have sparked interest from other parties. Enter-prise, unchanged at 395p. is understood to have made an indicative offer of about 75p. whereas Inn Business is thought to be looking for between 80p and 90p. Alchemy, the venture capitalist, is being tipped as a possible counter-bidder, while Century lans. off Ip at 1101:p. is viewed as a potential merger partner.

Alchemy is also in talks to acquire Swallow Group's Vaux Breweries arm for just under £70 million. Although the fourweek period of exclusivity has elapsed and there are still issides are hopeful of tying up a deal in the next ten days. Swallow ended 3¼p lighter at 286½p

UNILEVER'S generosity in handing back £5 billion to shareholders has had only a marginal impact on the food manufacturing sector.

Graham Jones at DKB says: "The results season, so far, has produced few surprises, but the sector continues to underperform relative to the rest of the market".

But a clearer picture of the industry has emerged and there are stocks that DKB is keen to recommend to clients. Top of its shopping list is Cadbury Schweppes, lp lighter at 960%p, having briefly moved above the £10 level.

Also on its list are Perdearer at 67%p, Terranova, %p firmer at 75%p, and Robert Wiseman, steady at quick to pick up on the sto ny had indicated one way. the other, whether it will trail both at home and abroad. The news came as the business support group pushed pre-tax profits up from £3.25 million to £4.68 million last year. The battle for control of the boardroom left Widney. 3p lower at 37%p. The company has been forced to call an extraordinary meeting by Barry Jordan and Stephen Roberts. who between them account for 12.85 per cent of the shares.

City Centre Restaurants finished 24p cheaper at 56p after abandoning plans to sell 46 Deep Pan Pizza restaurants to Queensborough Holdings. The smell of burnt fingers wafted round the market as the price of Corporate Services collapsed 53p to 113p on the back of a profits warning. Punters were piling into the shares on Friday hoping for some good news yesterday.

GILT-EDGED: The London bond market closed lower on the day but was still able to outperform its European counterparts with the help of better than expected industrial output and producer price numbers.

Overall trading conditions proved lacklustre ahead of the Budget. In the futures pit, the June series of the long gilt fin-ished 23p lower at £116.37 as 19,000 contracts were completed. In longs, Treasury 8 per cent 2021 shed 25p to £145.55, while in shorts Treasury 7 per cent 2002 eased 2p to £106.40. were mixed as market buils cooled their heels after Friday's record-breaking run. ### CMG

CMG is one of the best computer software companies, as this column has already noted on more than one occasion. Yesterday's annual results provided further proof that this is a business to be proud of. There are few shares which bring exposure to strong management skills and growing markets. CMG is one that does.

Yet for investors there is the problem of price. The attractions of CMG, and rivals such as Admiral and Logica, are well known to the stock market. CMG shares are chased hard too, and at £18.12, up 59p or 3.4 per cent yesterday, now trade on nearly 60 times 1998 earnings per share and 48 times estimated current year earnings.

of this business the tempta-tion to profit-take will be hard to resist. Especially if you have been in for some time, and especially because

CMG shares may weaken. with the sector as the millennium draws nearer. This weakening may not be justi-fied for CMG on fundamental grounds but the sector trends are not easy to buck. Holders should keep a weighting, however. And any fall in the share price should be seen by non-holders as an opportunity to buy.

IMI is a Midiands engineer that tends to call a spade a spade. The market has punished it for this plainspeaking, assuming the valves and fittings it makes are terribly low-tech because they are grouped under prosaic names such as "Building Products": The shares stood at 532p last May. Now they are 252p.

shades of Siebe, here - renaming divisions and generally presenting itself as more

The exercise is not entirely cynical and cosmetic: IMI has changed. It has hacked away at its dependence on commodity-type products and its drinks dispenser business is the world leader. Its meaty cash flow means it is able to fund growth through acquisition, although where it will buy is unclear.

One cloud that has hung over IMI is an ill-fated diversification into computer software. The managers responsible are still there. While solid, they lack the presentational sparkle of, say, Roberto Quar-ta at BBA. This may hamper the rebranding. Commerzbank, the securities house, believes IMI is unare still question marks over future growth, Commerzbank is probably right.

Brown should be thankful for a Keynesian bequest

The Chancellor owes a debt of gratitude to two men who reformed Tory economic policy

ince it is now too late to speculate about the contents of this afternoon's Budget - and since most people do not seem very interested anyway in what the Chancellor may or may not propose — this article will look at the Budget from another point of view. It seems that Gordon Brown has lived up to the highest aspiration proposed for the economics profession by Keynes. In a properly run economy, Keynes once said, economics should excite about as much public interest and political controversy as dentistry. This admirable defi-nition of the intellectual value of economics raises two questions about the state of the British economy today. Has Britain really attained the happy state of economic serenity in which arguments about interest rates, inflation and unemployment can be deared off the newspaper front pages? And if Britain has reached the nirvana of low inflation, full employment and adequate economic growth, should the credit go to the Chancellor, the Bank of England or simply to good luck?

A few weeks ago, even to ask the first question would have been considered an insult to the memory of the thousands of businesses and jobs which were going to die in the great recession about to engulf Britain. However favourable the numbers published by the Treasury on tax revenues, deficits and public spending, the City, business community, media and, of course, the Conservative Party, seemed united in their conviction that Britain was on the brink of an economic collarse.

In the past few weeks. though, confidence has suddenly returned. Retailers, estate agents and car dealers report clear signs of reviving demand. Industrialists and even exporters are more optimistic than they have been since last summer. And the financial community has moved in record time though one of its manic depres-sive swings. Yesterday Merrill Lynch reported the biggestrise in optimism about the British economy since its monthly surveys of fund manager opinion began in July 1990. What has happened to inspire this sudden turnround? I think the most plausible answer is the triumph of Keynesian dentistry over ideological economics. Businessmen, financiers and consumers have grad-ually realised that the British economy is now being managed in a professional, competent and thoroughly boring manner. The Treasury and the Bank of England are united in the objectives of maintaining low inflation, full employment and substantial economic growth. The fairly mechanistic principles of Keynesian economic dentistry show that, most of the time, it should be perfectly possible for an active policy of demand management to hit all these targets. As they begin to understand and believe this, British businessmen and consumers are starting to behave on the assumption that full employment, low inflation and adequate growth will, in fact, be maintained most of the time.

This is, I believe, the best way to explain the apparent miracle of economic stability in Britain. In fact, as shown in the charts above, the present stability is no miracle at all. British has merely returned to the conditions of full employment that were typical in the 1950s and 1960s. Until the mid-1970s it was taken for granted the world over that the primary economic responsibility of govern-ments and central banks was to maintain full employment by managing demand. Because businessmen and consumers believed this, they invested and spent money on the assumption that full employment and steady growth would, in fact, be maintained. As a result of

reason why Britain performed so much worse than most other economies during this Keynesian golden age was a persistent problem with the balance of payments. This trade problem was, in turn, largely attributable to the overvalued pound that Britain foolishly tried to "defend" at a time when Germany, France, Italy and Japan were all benefiting from their drastically devalued postwar exchange rates.

erhaps the biggest and most encouraging difference between the present period and the postwar decades is that Britain no longer seems to find too much difficulty in maintaining a decent balance of payments. Another way of saying this is that Britain's relative costs, even at the present exchange rate, are extremely competitive, especially in comparison with those of Germany and our other European neighbours. This, suggests that the pound is, for all the squeats of industry, not nearly as overvalued as in the period of balance of payments crises up to 1976. This short historical digressome of Labour's social objec-tives. As long as the economy is growing it is fairly easy to present a Budget that is simultaneously responsible, popular and rather boring, as Mr Brown will this afternoon. Provided the economy is not in recession, there is plenty of automatic revenue growth built into the British tax system. Without any need to change legislation, petrol and tobacco duties keep rising at rates far above inflation. And as long as real wages are rising, even at a modest rate, the revenue from a progressive income tax system automatically goes up much fast-er than national income. This creates a big and very profitable loophole for the Treasury in the system of indexation introduced by the Tories to stop income taxes rising automatically and surreptitiously through sion shows why Gordon Brown has been able to main-

chancellor" while handing out

dollops of money and tax cuts to sustain the Government's popularity and start to attain

"bracket creep". Taken together, all of the in-built sources of automatic "dynamism" in the tax system can allow any Chancellor to keep his promises of higher public capacity to spare for a few welltargeted tax cuts and training and enterprise programmes, as well as the odd popular lollipop in the social services. In other words, the alpha and conega of successful Budget policy is full employment and adequate economic growth. As long as recession is avoided, therefore, budgetary policy can be confined largely to technical issues of primary interest to finance directors and accountants. On issues such as inheritance tax or fiscal incentives for marriage there will still be legitimate political argument. But these arguments are - or should be - about justice, in-come distribution and social engineering. They are not about economic efficiency, still less about such macroeconomic issues as unemployment and inflation. Success or failure on the macroeconomic front depends far less on the political and social issues involved in the structure of the tax system than on the monetary decisions now made by the Bank -and these monetary decisions. in turn, largely determine the fiscal leeway available to the Chancellor to address his political and social aspirations.

his brings me back to the second question I asked at the start of this article. Who should get the credit for the good macroeconomic prospects that should allow Mr Brown to present a successful Budget this afternoon? The standard answer is either the Bank of England, for having successfully managed monetary policy. or Mr Brown himself, for hav ing the foresight to hand over monetary management to the Bank. But one only has to look at the European Central Bank in Frankfurt to see that central bank independence does not, by itself, promote either stability or full employment.

The real authors of Britain's present economic prosperityand of the present Chancelior's good fortune - were Kenneth Clarke and Norman Lamont. After Mr Brown made the Bank independent in 1997 it was fashionable to pour scorn on Mr Clarke for "politicising" monetary policy by failing to raise interest rates before the election. But given the abrupt strengthening of sterling and the subsequent slowdown of the British economy, it is certainly arguable that, in what was never more than a margin-al disagreement, Mr Clarke was right and the overly hawkish Bank was wrong. More importantly, the last two Tory ter White Wednesday and dedicated macroeconomic policy to the achievement of full employment and the active management of demand. It was, ironcially, the Tories who brought Keynesian economics back to both the Treasury and the pponents of the European Commission's plans to place a ban on tobacco advertising will be disappointed by the news that the England and Wales Cricket Board (ECB) has given up currivent the ban during this summer's cricket World Cup.

The ECB had planned what it calls "virtual advertisements". These are specially treated patches of grass on the cricket field or blank perime-ter boards on to which different advertising logos could be projected for broadcast in different territories. The idea was that when the TV pictures were beamed back to India, for example, adverts for Wills cigarettes could be inserted, so giving the ECB revenue from the makers but avoiding the wrath of Frank Dobson and

The ECB has tested this technology on two occasions, once during the South Africa v England test match in Cape Town last March and during the triangular one-day tournament last August. Both trials went well and the ECB tells me that it is keen to use the technology again. However, on this occasion, it has been dropped for what the ECB calls "financial and logistical reasons".

The glasnost that has been sweeping through the ECB since Lord MacLaurin of Knebworth became chairman has not gone far enough for the organisation to go into any more detail. But I suspect that the amount Wills was willing to pay for the pleasure of this sponsorship was not enough for the ECB to sort out the technical issues, give a slice to the television broadcaster and still achieve a sensible profit.
It is not as if cricket is so flush with money that it can turn sponsors away. For the World Cup, the ECB has four backers each paying £2 million for the pleasure of using the World Cup logo and having a patch of grass to themselves at all the World Cup venues.

Two of the sponsors are long-running friends of the ECB — NatWest, which has its own one-day trophy, and Vodafone, which shares Lord MacLaurin as chairman and is already putting £15 million towards England's national team. Both are starting large promotional pushes binked to the cricket World Cup, and are pleased that there is not any important football this summer to get in the way of putting their message in front of key ABC1 males, who tend to make up the cricket-watch-

relatively new. Pepsi has nev-er sponsored cricket in the UK, and its sponsorship will be targeted at India, Pakistan and Sri Lanka, where it has a big battle on with Coca-Cola. During the last cricket World Cup, which was in the sub-continent, Coke was the official sponsor and Pepsi ambushed the sponsorship, signing up leading cricketers such as Sachin Tendulkar and using the slogan "nothing official about it". The final sponsor is Emirates - Airlines, which backed last year's triangular tournament and is pushing new routes to Australia. Four is not many lead sponsors for an important competition and if the virtual sponsorship had worked it would have been a boon. And not only to the ECB. There will be quite a few sporting organisa-tions who will be disappointed that the ECB is not going through with the experiment. Take rugby union's five nations' championship. It has a lucrative sponsorship deal with Lloyds TSB, which got an early shock when England were nearly kicked out of the competition. However, it has also had problems with displaying the sponsors' name on the pitch. Last month's international between France and Ireland at Landsdowne Road, Dublin, will go down in histo-ry because the paint used to display the Lloyds TSB symbol in the centre of the pitch came off on the players.

This incident led the various rugby football unions to decide to restrict the sponsors signage to just the "in goal" areas, which only tend to come on screen when tries are being scored. This of course cuts the amount of exposure Lloyds TSB will have this season.

Rugby would be a good target for virtual advertising, as would football, where it is hard to paint the pitch because the players' studs churn it up too much. Also in motor rac ing, cars can be projected with different liveries in different territories, again sidestepping the tobacco sponsorship rules. This would relieve the BAT team of the problem it has with the FIA, which runs Formula One and will not allow it to paint its cars in different colours, advertising different products for the same race. The future of sponsorship is virtually upon us. jason_nisse@the-times.co.uk

Mis-selling of MPPI must be avoided

From the Deputy Director-General, Council of Mort-gage Lenders

Times (March 3) offers a very negative view of mortgage payment protection insurance and the partnership which is being lorged between the Gov-ernment, lenders and insurers. Ministers and officials have been very clear throughout that mis-selling must be avoided and that the quality of the product must improve The CML and the Association of British Insurers have been fully in agreement with this.

that making sure the policies are necessary (ie, targeted at the right people) and effective twill pay out on the main insurable risk) is a reasonable stance. Such concerns have been central to the work which has been undertaken and that will continue. The industry will obviously want to respond to the Insurance Ombudsman's concerns but, in the meantime, one clarification is required regarding the target. The aim is certainly to increase take up and to get all those who need MPPI to take it out. However, any agreed target will always be subject to two key provisos. First, that whether it can be achieved or not will be strongly influenced by circumstances in the economy and second, the target is an estimate of those who need it. Because mis-selling must not occur, the target itself must be treated as intended: simply a best estimate of need. Yours faithfully,

PETER WILLIAMS. Deputy Director-General. Council of Mortgage Lenders, 3 Savile Row. WIX LAF.

CONSTERNATION at the Mansion House at a lunch yesterday for the King of Swaziland, in town on an official visit. All was going well until the toasts. No problem with the Lord Mayor, Lord Levene of Portsoken. Then the toast master cried: "Raise your glasses for Mswati III of Swaziland." There was suddenly the Taxing times AS THE Chancellor prepares to deliver his Budget, I understand that relations are still strained with the Inland Revenue after last year's statement. This contained a couple of measures on taxation that

Brands and supermarkets

From Mr Stephen Sidkin

Sir, Parallel importers point to the overcharging by brand owners (The Times, February 26). But the question must be asked as to who created the desirability of the branded product.
It is only by the investment made by brand owners in developing a market that parallel importers can exist. Under the smokescreen of benefiting consumers, parallel importers feed off the demand that has been created for them. This assists supermarkets ket share. This has been clear since the events leading up to the 1992 Monopolies and Mergers Commission investigation into fine fragrances. But in view of the current competition investigation into supermarket pricing, there is a delicious taste of irony in the supermarkets' claim to advance consumers' interests by parallel importing. At the same time it must be engaged in parallel importing

questioned as to how much the law needs to change. A parallel importer from the US into the UK may be able to take advantage of the Trade Marks Act 1994. This permits a third party to use a registered trade gimmick, a flash-in-the-pan human resources tool, or even belonging to the trade mark owner. This is subject to the requirement that such use is in accordance with honest practices in industrial or commercial matters. The purpose of this statutory provision is to allow comparative advertising. Whether it can be relied on by the parallel importer depends on his actions being in accordance with such practices and judicial interpretation. Yours faithfully, STEPHEN SIDKIN, Partner, Fox Williams, City Gate House, 39-45 Finsbury Square, London. EC2A IUU.

City sonnets

From Ms Rosamund Smith

Sir, Why are City businesses making an increasing use of poetry? The article "Sonnets in the City" (Business News, February 27) was refreshing in not trivialising the Poet in the City initiative and the role of the arts in the Square Mile, Corporate reading and writing of poetry is not the latest executive just plain self-indulgence. John Mole, the City of London's first official poet, is creating a dialogue both inside and between City businesses and local schools. Poetry is the community broker to connect the City business that questions involvement because it does not recruit children from Tower Hamlets schools and the school that assumes City busi-

to be renamed after banks. Unsurprisingly, Nobel prizewinner Seamus Heaney puts it best: poetry is "like the writing in the sand in the face of which accusers and accused are left speechless and renewed".

Yours faithfully, ROSAMUND SMITH, Chair. Poet in the City. Bates, Wells and Braithwaite Solicitors, Cheapside House, 138 Cheapside,

In our opinion even one occasion is one too many. We meet a surprising number of lawyers who are short changing their talents. Many work for major firms. Many are high achievers working on highly respected clients. But many are dissatisfied, Long hours and constant stress have frequently compromised their quality of life.

Let us offer an inspired solution.

Denton Hall is widely regarded as one of the country's premier practices. Our IP group is undoubtedly one of the leading litigation departments in the City. With major clients ranging across motor, media, toys, chemicals, pharmaceutical, retail, aerospace, financial, electronics, telecomms, sports and entertainment industries, we can offer our team a unique range of top quality cases. Little wonder that we have just been shortlisted again as Team of the Year at the Legal Business Awards.

However, at Denton Hall, high-profile clients, high-level involvement and high quality training are matched by an equally high quality of life. We promise to stretch you further, wider and deeper than most practices

In Britain today. But, we also promise you a fulfilling life outside the office. We'll help you re-discover that elusive balance. Because, we believe that the most interesting, well-rounded people make the best lawyers.

If you agree with this refreshingly different outlook, let's talk. Right now, we're looking for Senior IP Lawyers, with at least four to five years' experience. Professionals with an Impressive track record in case management, an obvious talent for leading and building business, as well as a clear potential to make early partnership. We are also looking for younger IP Lawyers with as little as two years' litigation experience.

Do you have that vital experience? Do you have the personal skills, agile intellect and articulate talents that are so essential? Do you want to run your own life? When you are certain of your answers, please contact either Jacqui Burgess or Paul Green in our Personnel Department on 0171 320 6016 or 0171 320 6017, or write to us with your CV at Denton Hail, 5 Chancery Lane, Clifford's Inn, London EC4A 1BU.

Free speech: important questions of principle

he Sunday Telegraph has indicated cannot achieve its object of ensuring that the that it may be returning to court for a ruling on whether Mr Justice Rix was correct to grant his recent injunction to Jack Straw. The Home Secretary obtained the injunction to stop publication of leaked extracts from the report of the inquiry into the murder of Stephen Lawrence.

Although the injunction was lifted the next day to allow the media to report what the early editions had already put into the public domain, important points of principles of the health of the public domain. ple need to be clarified by the courts. Whether or not judges subscribe to the view of Thomas Jefferson that we should prefer "newspapers without a government" to "government without newspapers", they should recognise the basic requirements of free speech in this context.

For many years newspaper and broadcasting organisations have objected to judges granting lastminute injunctions, which require the presses to be stopped or schedules to be al-tered, with little — if any opportunity for the defendant to present an opposing argument, or for the judge to consider the difficult issues

The concerns of the media have been heightened recently with the passage through Parliament of the Human Rights Act 1998, which will take effect next year. They expressed fears that the introduction into English law of a right to private life would exacerbate the granting of injunctions in urgent cases late into the evening - and so hinder freedom of expression. The Home Secretary recognised the force of these concerns and recommended to Parliament a provision, which became Section 12 of the Act, to state principles applicable whenever a court is considering whether to grant a remedy that might affect freedom of expression. Section 12 is not yet in force. But it summarises the content of existing law. Section 12(2) says that if the respondent is neither present nor represented, the court should not grant a remedy unless satisfied that the applicant has taken "all practicable steps to notify the respondent" or there are compeiling reasons why the respondent should not be notified (for example, in a case involving national security). Because of the urgency, the Treasury Solicitor did take all practicable steps to notify The Sunday Telegraph but its legal adviser. Julia Braybrook, had only a brief opportunity to make representations to Mr Justice Rix. Where there is such extreme urgency that the notification respondent has a proper opportunity to answer the claim, the court should be especially cautious about granting an injunction.

Section 12(3) adds that a remedy should not be granted so as to restrain publication before a full trial unless the court is satisfied that the applicant is likely to establish at such a trial that publication should not be allowed. The Home Secretary correctly told the House of Commons during the passage of the Human Rights Act that this embodies the principle stated by the European Court of Human Rights that prior restraints on publi-cation "call for the most careful scrutiny" because "news is a perishable commodity". The less time the judge has to consider the matter, and the more limited the opportunity the respondent has to present the case against the granting of a remedy, the more unlikely

it is that the judge can be satisfied as to what the result would be after a full trial, and so the more reluctant the judge should be to grant an emergency injunction. Section 12(4) tells the court to have particular regard to the right to freedom of expression and, where the case concerns journalistic, literary or artistic material, to the extent to which "the material has, or is about to, become available to the public" and to the extent to which it is "in the public interest for the material to be published".

During the passage of the Human Rights Act, the Home Secretary told the Pannick OC House of Commons that "if a story will shortly be published anyway, for example in another country or on the Internet, that must affect the decision whether it is appropriate to restrain publication in this country". Since The Sunday Telegraph had already started to distribute the story in the first edition, and the full report would be published in four days in any event, an injunc-tion was not appropriate, especially in rela-tion to a matter of public interest.

B ecause last-minute injunctions against the press are, by definition, sought and granted with no proper time for reflection by lawyers and judges, it is of especial importance that the relevant general principles are well understood. In the light of these principles, the injunction against The Sunday Telegraph should not have been sought and it should not have

Frank Presland, the lawyer who manages Sir Elton John's business affairs: "There are huge swaths of business that are run by lawyers"

I don't have many clients who call me 'sweetie'

ast week Sir Elton John had cause to celebrate. He had won a landmark ruling from the Press Complaints Commission. It had ruled that the pop star's privacy had been inva-ded when long-lens photo-graphs were taken and pub-lished of his guests — Victoria "Posh Spice" Adams and the footballer David Beckham -

City firm Eversheds, it was just another day in the com-plex dealings arising from handling his affairs.

The millionaire pop icon is clearly no ordinary client: his companies last year turned over more than $100 million (£61 million), more than the entire turnover of the London office of Eversheds,

What this means for his lawyer. Frank Presland, is a whole new role: he has become Sir Elton's business manager. So consuming is the job that Mr Presland, a commercial litigator and arbitrator by training who has worked for years in the entertainment world, in effect now does it full-time.

The lawyer as business manager is a new phenomenon in Britain, but in America it is commonplace. "There are," Mr Presland says, "huge swaths of business that are run by lawyers. It is not even noteworthy. They go back and forth from law firms to business ... the Disney Corporation and Warner Bros are run by lawyers and it will become increasingly common here."

There have been high-profile examples: Robert (now Lord) Alexander, OC, caused a stir when he left the Bar at the height of his career ten years ago to chair NatWest. What is more unusual is to retain a foot in both camps: Mr Presland, who was chairman of Frere Colmeley before it merged last year with Eversheds, is still a senior partner and he does have other clients for instance, the producers of Riverdance in their dispute with Michael Flatley. Mr Pres- mark. Mr Valner also handled land says: "Many lawyers see themselves as not only stuck in private practice but in one area of law. But to start out in law and to think you will do the same thing for 40 years is a depressing prospect. It's good to take time out and reinvent

Mr Presland was Sir Elton's personal lawyer for 17 years. He was then asked to set up a separate area of business to handle his personal finances. When Sir Elton's business manager left last spring after a dispute. Mr Presland was asked to take over. "I am his business manager but not in the entertainment sense." he explains. "I don't run his diary, promote his records or fix his recording schedules."

Nicholas Valner is the head of litigation and a leading arbitrator at Eversheds. But he has had close dealings over many years with the Beatles, Sting and has acted for Apple. 'Apple is a vast organisation with a huge turnover and we have been involved in every aspect of its business as a corporate entity," he says. "I have at-tended board meetings, al-most as in-house counsel."

Last week he was handling trademark issue with Volkswagen, to do with the registering of "Beetle" and how that would affect the "Beatle" the case in which Sting's accountant was prosecuted. Mr Valner brought an action against Coutts and other financial bodies, recovering almost all the £8 million lost, and now also finds himself instructed by Mr Presland, his fellow partner, on litigation matters for Sir Elton. "Frank is now ton John Management." Eversheds, he says, "thrilled" when Mr Presland was appointed to run Sir Elton's affairs. The firm receives a "very substantial" payment for his services and, of course, the spin-off of work that spreads out to various depart-my client. I report to him at El-or Mr Presland, too, much of the work is acting like an inhouse company lawyer. One minute he instructs on a privacy case or tax affairs; the next on a trademark problem or investments. "This morning," he adds, "I have spoken with our private capipartner on the establishment of a trust arrangement for Elton John."

The takeover by lawyer-managers is often prompted by a moving-out of the traditional-style managers who handled everything and took a percentage of the earnings - such as Brian Epstein with the Beatles and Colonel Tom Parker with Elvis Presley. The affairs of these artists are much more complex, with rights all over the place and tax affairs that run through different countries. Mr Presland says:

Sport is another field witnessing the growth of the lawyer-manager, albeit to a lesser extent. "The window of earnings for a sportsman can be quite narrow," Mr Presland says. "But with an artist, copyright lasts for 70 years after the death of a composer. Elton John has released 34 albums under different labels; he is employed by three different comnamies for three different kinds of work trecords, composine and performing). There is also film work and promotions." Inevitably, the shift from lawyer to business manager can bring a closer relationship. "We share an interest in football and he often rines me on Saturday afternoon to get the scores," Mr Presland says. Sir Elton, he says, does not: like things to be dull. And business is handled differently. "You tend to go to him. And the way he is influences the way things are run. He has a phenomenal memory and pays huge attention to detail. He is exceptionally hard-work ing and talented, and that

The offices also reflect the dient: "We have real art works. not prints . . . and scented candles, that sort of thing," Mr Presland says. "And I don't. have many clients who call me sweetie."

What is the big idea?

Intellectual Property Officer

One of the many things that makes us unique among the world's top consulting firms is that we actually make products. PA Consulting is creating the new thinking and new technology that is driving the growth and boosting the performance of forward-thinking companies. So here at our Global Technology Centre in Melbourn, there are always lots of exciting new ideas in the making.

But spotting a good idea is only the first stage in the development of tomorrow's winning technologies. If our clients are to enjoy the full market potential of any innovation, watertight legal protection is essential. And that could very well be where you come in. Join our fast-growing Commercial Group, and you will work alongside consultants, scientists and engineers to identify, evaluate and protect a broad portfolio of valuable yet often intangible assets.

You will be entering a fast-moving, results-driven environment, in which deadlines are tight and the analytical challenges are significant. We are looking for a graduate with at least two years' IP-focused experience in a technology-based environment.

Cambridge

You will know how to prepare accurate documentation, be familiar with relevant legislation and patent formalities. A strong team player with assured IT skills, you will also be an exceptional communicator, equally conversant in the languages of scientists, engineers and lawyers.

PA Consulting Group offers a challenging, exhilarating and highly rewarding arena in which to develop your career. One of the many big ideas to come out of PA is that every member of the firm should be a share-holder - and that the size of bonuses should be linked directly to individual performance. The package includes comprehensive benefits, including an opportunity to accumulate shares in the business, so you will have a real stake in the success you create.

Get the idea? Then send a full cv, quoting Ref. IPR/TL/03, to Michelle Keeley. PA Consulting Group, Cambridge Technology Centre, Melboum, Herts SG8 6DP. E-mail: michelie.keeley@pa-consulting.com PA is an equal opportunity employer.

The man who chose to act for genocide defendants

ists in Uganda last week has brought back my own vivid memories of working as a barrister in Rwanda in the aftermath of the genocide there. I am an English criminal barrister who was then based in London. But last year, after reading an International Bar Association article in The Lawyer appealing for help, I worked for four months for Avocats sans Frontières (AsF), a Belgian non-governmental or-ganisation. AsF sends Frenchspeaking lawyers into Rwanda to represent defendants and civil parties (victims and relatives of victims who can claim civil damages) in the gen-ocide trials. Most of its lawyers are recruited from West African countries or Belgium.

I was the first common lawtrained lawyer to have worked in these trials. Although Rwanda created a new Bar in 1997, it contains only 50 or so lawyers, many of whom are understandably unwilling to represent defendants. So there is an urgent need for this form of humanitarian assistance.

The genocide began on April 6, 1994, at 8.30pm, when the private jet belonging to Juvénal Habyarimana, the President of the Republic of Rwanda, was shot down by a land-to-air missile as it prepared to land in Kigali. All passengers and crew were killed.

The genocide attempt started within hours of the crash and lasted a hundred days. It is estimated that between 600,000 and 900,000 Rwandans lost their lives, most of them members of the Tutsi minority (who constituted about 10 per cent of the eight million population).

In August 1994, the Government announced that it would reimpose the rule of law by bringing to justice the perpetrators. Large sections of the population were arrested, sometimes indiscriminately. But many with a high level of responsibility for the genocide have escaped justice and are still in exile in the neighbour-ing Democratic Republic of

A small advertisement in The Lawver lured an English barrister to defend the seemingly indefensible in Rwanda. Paul Hardy explains

Congo. About 130,000 men, women and children, all presumed innocent by law, were being held in overcrowded prisons awaiting trial in Rwanda. A new judicial system needed to be established urgently. This was no small task. The legal profession was severely damaged as a result of the genocide - lawyers and judges were reduced in number from 900 to about 200. Many who survived wanted little more to do with the profession.

The first trials began in December 1996. If you take into account the progress of the trials and mortality rate, it is estimated that a prisoner has a one-in-twenty chance of being tried. Each trial is tried by three judges or lay magistrates who have each received four months of training. Rwandan criminal justice is largely based on the inquisito-

judges question witnesses and defendants and find the facts. Their role and integrity is therefore pivotal to an effective and fair system of justice. Many are Tutsi, and many may feel under pressure to convict. Theirs is the hardest role within the justice system: quite simply, the system relies on their good faith.

There were about 15 As Flawyers living in a house in Kiga-We received briefs on the "cab-rank" principle and would expect to be in court anywhere in the country three or four days a week.

[/3 DROP +2]In my own experience, which was typical, I did not represent a defendant who had not been charged with genocide and crimes against humanity. But accusations varied widely. I represented some alleged to have planned the genocide of a district, others who appeared to have killed with extraordinary zeal, others who were coerced into action, a boy (and therefore not at risk of the death penalty) who, 14 at the time of the genocide, was alleged to have used his dogs to chase

es, and a few against whom it was difficult to apportion any

My efforts were concerned mainly with avoiding the death penalty. In light of a low acquittal rate, pragmatic advice was often required. The challenge for a common law-trained lawyer was the need to adapt quickly to the peculiar culture of the trials and the inquisitorial system of justice. Inconsistencies in evidence that are often raised in English courts held no sway in Rwanda. It was a question of gaining the trust of the judges, who were suspicious of the enough to have been nowhere near Rwanda when the genocide occurred.

The role of a defence lawyer was almost universally misunderstood. In representing a genocidaire" you were often considered an accomplice.

Major trials, which might be advertised by loud-hailer or over the radio and which were often televised, attracted big crowds. It was not uncommon to find questions put via the presiding judge to a witness, a closing speech or a mitigation regularly interrupted by boos and ieers from the crowd, incensed that anyone should be uttering such words of defence in public. In those circumstances we were grateful for the presence of a presiding magis-trate who was in control of his or her court.

During a break in a long trial, with 21 defendants, one judge said to me: "It's such a hard task for us finding the truth in these trials." He was right; he was one of a number of judges who worked assiduously, sifting through the heap of conflicting allegations for months on end, trying to reach the right conclusion.

After three continuous weeks of this trial it was time for me to leave. I approached the same judge and bade him farewell. Almost as an afterthought and without any malice, he said: "You are lucky to be able to leave all this behind." He was right: I was lucky to have that choice.

It is remarkable to think that these historic trials are taking place at all. Ten lawyers fly into Rwanda each month to stay between five weeks and a year. AsF aims to maintain a presence of 15 lawyers at any one time in the hope that 50 per cent of trials are covered. Their creation is a brave attempt to use the rule of law as a signal that justice will one day be established in this lawless land almost destroyed by genocide.

Tobacco trials are big business in America but will never take off here, says James D. Zirin itigation against British tobacco companies has ground to a halt. In the wake of last month's ruling that hung cancer victims were too late to bring action against Gallaher and Imperial Tobacco, a further six claimants have now thrown in

With the abandonment of the multimillion-pound law suit against the two cigarette giants, Martyn Day, the lead lawyer in the action, says it is now "very unlikely that we will see a tobacco trial in this country".

The contrast with what is happening in the United States could not be starker. The liability of tobacco companies for product-induced healthcare costs is unparalleled in Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence. Rather than the traditional suing for damages based on product liability, the state and federal governments now tap the tobacco companies for huge cash awards. Recently a group of American companies known as Big Tobacco made a $206 billion settlement with the state covernments, of which about a third will line the pockets of trial lawyers.

President Clinton says that his Justice Department is seeking to recover "hundreds of billions of dollars" from the tobacco companies. The President's legal theory is that under the Medicare Recovery Act, the Government may recover from third parties amounts that can be shown to have caused an increase in Medicare costs. The tobacco companies will undoubtedly try to pass these huge costs on to the consumer.

The theory of the state settlements is that the states funded Medicaid payments to the victims of a tobacco-induced illness. The federal Government similarly hopes to recover funds, under Medicare, on similar grounds, Both theories are legally and morally flawed. It is virtually unbeard of for a medical insurer to seek recovery against the maker of a product alleged to have caused a payment for a covered claim, indeed, a particular injustice is that state and federal governments have campaigned against ciga-rette smoking since the 1960s. If it really was so bad, why didn't they refuse to insure smokers under Medicaid and Medicare?

But Big Tobacco seems to be so punch drunk it will probably cave in to the federal claims and settle the cases. After all, it would like the Government to waive claims for criminal liability, punitive damages and fines, and to abandon possible plans for federal regulation of tobacco.

T hat rubs against the grain is the paternalism and unfairness inherent in the Government's position. First, smokers warned of the risk freely continued to consume tobacco products at their great peril. Secondly, the Government insured such people against healthcare costs without any increased premium associated with the increased risk. Thirdly, the Government was so wary of the risk involved that it mandated a warning on every cigarette package and campaigned to discourage smoking. To pile illogic on inequity, the tobacco companies will be permitted tax deductions on amounts paid in settlement, so that a half or more of the multibillion-dollar settlements will be paid for out of the public purse.

In Britain, Labour has shown no inclination to step in; and the prospect of legal ac-tions by health authorities look equally remote. The Government has told NHS trusts that litigation against the tobacco companies would require amendments to the law and none is planned.

LEGAL APPOINTMENTS

FAX: 0171 782 7899

This is an opportunity to join a fully integrated, global legal team, working for a successful. emerging pharmaceutical company whose activities span the UK, Europe and the USA.

Since its full listing on the London Stock Exchange in 1994, Chiroscience has acquired two additional companies, invested further in research and development and its operations continue to expand. Its first major product should be launched internationally this year. The company now seeks an additional lawyer to join its Cambridge operation. In a senior and challenging role you will work closely with the Director of Legal Affairs providing cross border legal services for the Chiroscience group of companies.

Working in multi-disciplinary teams with business development and senior research professionals you will provide an essential service advising on contractual issues, joint ventures and collaboration arrangements with other companies and corporate transactions.

To perform this role you need 4-7 years experience of contract based commercial law and some exposure. ideally, to working in-house. A knowledge of transactional intellectual property would be helpful but is not essential. Most important will be your flexibility to see business solutions combined with your positive and enthusiastic approach to doing business and making things happen in an emerging and expanding international company.

You will report to the Director of Legal Affairs who splits her time between the USA and the UK and will work closely with other directors. There maybe some international travel and the compensation and benefits package is attractive. Chiroscience offers the opportunity to join a relatively small but successful and cutting edge company that is growing quickly and investing heavily in its people.

Who's been speaking to Rumpole? The new rule in theory means that both the client and the lawyer could be required to hand over confidential material nat you tell your law-er is confidential. Or it? Communicaions between lawyer and client in the privacy of the former's office are akin to those of the confessional. They are covered by privilege, one of the legal profession's fundamental articles of faith.

But all of this could be about to change. From next month new rules of court ome into force that will govern all rivil disputes. And they could have far-reaching and unwelcome consquences for everyone who consult a lawyer.

Buried deep if the new rules is the seemingly injuctions Rule 48.7, which concerns the power of the court to make a awyer who mishandles a case prsonally pay the wasted costs: May people would rightly applaud sich a move. But the rule also give the court the power to direct a lawyer to commit vhat would normilly be a serious What you tell your lawyer may no longer be covered by privilege, say Penny Lewis and Michael Bowden professional offence—to give confidential documents belonging to the client to the other side in a dispute, without the client's consent. Until now, any lawyer who disclosed a "privileged" document to his client's opponent could usually expect trouble from the Law Society.

The rule means that both the client and the lawyer could be required to hand over confidential material, whether the client likes it or not. And unless the Lord Chancellor's Department issues guidelines or practice directions as to just how this power is to be used, it could mean that no client can ever be absolutely sure that privileged material will remain secret for in the case of R v Derby Magistrates (1995) in relation to secrets disclosed to a lawyer by his client that "his mouth is shut forever". From next month this will no longer be the case.

The new rule appears to upset a law that was established in the 16th century; namely, that communications between a client and his or her lawyer will be as sacrosanct as secrets divulged to a priest in the confessional or between a journalist and his source. Indeed, it seems so radical that some lawyers are wondering whether the authors of the new rules have, in their real, forgotten that the Act which gave them power to write the new measures limits their scope to "practice

In the Derby Magistrates case, the House of Lords declared that the "privilege" rules which ensure that lawyers keep their clients' secrets are "more than a rule of evidence, limited in application to an individual case, but a fundamental condition on which the administration of justice rests". Although the Act authorising the new rules also permits changes to the rules of evidence, the court in Derby Magistrates has said that the "privilege" rules are more than mere rules of

One that attacked privilege could therefore be said to go far beyond mere practice and procedure and might also undermine human rights legislation, which is supposed to confer on everyone the right to a fair trial. If the right to re-tain control over disclosures to one's own lawyer is perceived as fundamental to the fair administration of justice, then - unless carefully controlled - the new rule could prejudice the right to a fair trial entrenched in Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Such radical changes in policy should be properly discussed should not be introduced through the back door by means of possibly ultra vires secondary legislation and should be considered very carefully. If directions governing the application of the new rule are in the pipeline, then the powers-thatbe are leaving their publication until the last minute - the new rule is due to take effect in a matter of

Making the right moves on mediation

he deal agreed last week between lawyers for the former Oasis drummer Tony McCarroll and the remaining band members was a classic last-minute settlement "at the doors of the court".

The game of mutual bluff was finally over but it had taken the prospect of days in front of the judge, and escalating legal fees, to concentrate efforts. It con-firmed to objective observers that there is a better way to resolve disputes.

The signs are that with the imminent arrival of the Civil Procedure Rules (the "Woolf" reforms) mediation is on the verge of a

ing the past 12 months there has been an estimated increase of 100 per cent and that figure is likely to be repeated for the foreseeable future. As a result, people now believe that a turning point has been reached in the alternative dispute

The public

must have confidence

The question is, are there enough trained, qualified and experienced mediators to take on this workload? There are several competing mediation bodies - including, notably, the Centre for Dispute Resolution, the ADR Group and the Academy of Experts - each with its own training course and qualifications. Among these bodies there is a discreet jockeying for position as an important debate starts about how to ensure a quality service in an burgeoning

A distinguished group of established big names, the so-called Magnificent Seven in the Panel of Independent Mediators (PIM), have joined together. While some members of PIM are partners in law firms — such as Andrew Paton of Pinsent Curtis and Philip Howell-Richardson of Morgan Cole others are independent.

Some people wonder whether there are enough competent me-diators available. Successful, widespread mediation is crucial to the Woolf drive for faster, cheaper alternatives to court hearings. If the system is to work, then the public and legal profession at large must have confidence in the services

Currently there is no formal requirement for training or qualifications, and if demand for mediation exceeds supply, then the danger is that inexperienced or unqualified mediators will jump in to fill the gap. Established mediators recognise that this would be disastrous. The agreement has to command the full voluntary backing of the participants but a key feature is that mediation is not binding. If badly conducted mediation leads to a succession of nonagreements, then confidence in the technique will start to fail.

There is plenty of goodwill at present. Professor Karl Mackie and his team at the Centre for Dispute Resolution have spent the past few years promoting mediation and providing well-regarded train-ing courses. Acting as a clearing house, CEDR has helped in more than 2,000 mediations. including many that have involved sums of more than £100 million.

In the immediate future the market will decide who gets most of the work. If the Woolf reforms work, then before too long there may be a real clamour for tighter regulation.

With other sources of finance, such as banks, wary of the risk in supplying big sums of money to growing firms, and with stock market flotations becoming less attractive. the need for venture capital is even more acute. The Govern-ment is keen to recognise venture capital's role in driving productivity by financing companies for growth.

Measures are expected in today's Budget to promote corporate venturing, the process by which big companies take a stake in smaller growing firms.

The venture capital industry has invested £23 billion in more than 16,500 companies since 1983, and the size of the industry grows every year. This month its coffers will be boosted by an extra £100 million flowing into venture capital trusts from investors rushing to use up, for this tax year. the relief that the trusts provide from capital gains and in-

David Thorpe, investment director at Priends, Ivory and Sime, said: "There is a lot of money out there, but it does not mean it is all invested." Competition for deals is

is that a venture capitalist is interested only in companies likely to grow — and grow fast. A projected return of 25 per cent within three to five years is usually the least they will setper cent are common. Venture capitalists argue that this is justified by the risk that they take in backing growth companies. Duncan Innes, of Marriott Harrison, a corporate/media law firm, said: "There is a general acceptance that average returns of 30 per cent will be much harder to achieve in this economic climate and that they might have to drop by as much as 15 per cent, although many will still strive for the same levels as before."

Paul Thomas, of Gresham Trust, the investment capital company, said: We are not going to revise our projected level of returns. It is all about backing the right people, who will survive in better shape than the rest. But we do need to become focused on doing the right deals."

Muriel Downs, managing director of Production Equipment, a hydraulics manufacturer in Slough, negotiated a £1.2 million deal with Barclays Ventures last year. She said: They really have to be able to see growth potential. We are aiming for 30 per cent, al-though in this climate I doubt this much will be achieved."

Call to delay launch of minimum wage

A three-month delay in en-forcing the national minimum wage is being demanded by business lobby groups. Em-ployers' organisations, including the CBI and the Institute of Directors, say that the minimum wage is 100 complicated for firms to comply with by the time it becomes law on April 1. The Department of Trade and Industry has published its guidelines for employers only 18 working days before the

■ British businesses are becoming better payers, according to a new survey by Grant Thornton, the accountant. It says that small and medium-sized firms in the UK have reduced their payment times by one week, from 52 days to 46 days, since the survey began in 1993. This brings the UK into the top ten best payers in the European Union, for which the average payment wait is 55 days, Greece—at 87 days—has replaced Italy—at 81 days - as the country with the worst payment record.

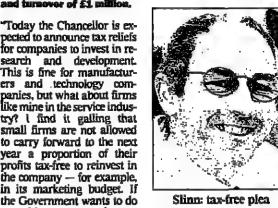

Firms that have transformed themselves through information and communication technology can enter the ISI/Interforum awards. I find it galling that small firms are not allowed to carry forward to the next year a proportion of their profits tax-free to reinvest in the company — for example, in its marketing budget. If the Government wants to do something constructive to drive productivity, it must look at the needs of all smaller firms, not just some."

Etiquette for e-mailers

-mail exists to make life easier and if used correctly is an invaluable tool for businesses of all sizes. However, many people com-pose an e-mail as if chatting to a friend on the telephone. An e-mail may be quick to compose and send, but this does not mean that no thought should go into it, particularly

The key to deciding what type of e-mail is appropriate is to think about who you are communicating with. When in doubt, act as if writing a letter to a customer and leave the exclamation marks and funny faces: ) to Meg Ryan and Tom Hanks. Such dialogue, used in their new film, You've Got Mail, is far from that required when answering inquiries about availability of car parts. However, there are some simple etiquette rules. Keep emails brief and to the point, reply within 24 hours and change the "Re:" or "Subject:" box heading if ongoing correspondence shifts to a new topic. Start e-mails formally "Dear ..." as in a letter, particularly on first communication. This will also not cause offence when e-mailing firms abroad. Last week's government announcement that electronic documents, such as e-mails, will be on the same legal foot-ing as the paper-based word is good news for companies wanting to save time and administrative costs by doing as much business as possible electronically. If orders start arrivBUSINESS BYTES

ing by e-mail, it is wise to review your standard terms and conditions, or at least to make provision for e-mail in any written agreements with customers or suppliers. Some company websites allow e-mails containing orders to be placed only via a screen stating terms and conditions, an important factor if a dispute arises later. Also, consider the use of company e-mail facilities by staff. A firm has a duty to take reasonable steps to ensure that e-mailing by staff is legal. Emailing pomographic or other risky material is a sackable offence and imperils a firm's standing. It may be worth reminding staff that the server logs and records all e-mails. Many big companies try to counter this problem by attaching permanent disclaimers such as "Internet communications are not secure and therefore X does not accept legal responsibility for the contents of this message. Any opinions are solely those of the author." The creation of a permanent

Guppy described the 25-yard shot

According to Martin O'Neill, the Leicester manager. Guppy, formerly with Wycombe Wanderers and Port Vale, is in good form. "He's been remarkably consistent and it's great to have a winger who gets back and does his defensive jobs,"

That is good news for those who have him in their Fantasy teams; for Fantasy League purposes, he is classed as a full back, so he receives three points from any Leicester clean sheets, but his raids down the flanks mean that he will grab plenty of two-point assists too.

Leicester's 2-1 defeat by Leeds United last Monday left him with a one-point deficit, but Saturday's

Queen's Bench Division

Steep staircase not a nuisance

Regina v Bristol City Council. Ex parte Everett Before Lord Justice Hirst, Lord Justice Munmery and Lord Justice

Dudgment February 26 The power conferred on local au-thorities by Part III of the Environ-mental Protection Act 1990 to abate statutory nuisances did not extend to cases where the state of the premises was such that there was a likelihood of an accident causing

The Court of Appeal so held disine court of Appeal so near dismissing an appeal by Sandra Everett from the dismissal by Mr Justice Richards (The Times May 27, 1996) of her application for judicial review of a decision by Bristol City Camed in withdraw on Describer Council to withdraw on December 9, 1996 an abatement notice dated February 2i, 1994 and served in respect of statutory nuisance at 14 Bannerman Road, Easton, Bristol. Section 79 of the 1990 Act provides: "(1) ... the following matters constitute statutory muisances for the purposes of this part, that is to say - (a) any premises in such a state as to be prejudicial to health "(7) In this Part ... 'prejudicial to health' means injurious, or likely to cause injury to health." Mr Nigel Pleming, OC and Mr nineteenth-century two-bedroom terraced house was in such a state as to be "injurious or likely to cause injury to health".

The judge had held that the council had no power to serve the abatement notice on the housing association which owned the property on the complaint of its tenant. ty on the complaint of its tenant, he applicant.
He also held that, as the state of the staircase was not capable of fall-ing within section 79(1)(a) of the 1990 Act, the abatement notice was not valid and even if it was that the council was entitled to withdraw it. Mr Pleming had argued for an "updating construction", recognising that the acceptable level of harm and the acceptable level of risk changed with time.

The logic of his arguments would have been more difficult to resist had the function of the court been to construct a fresh economic.

But they had less cogency within the less ambinious confines of judicial interpretation of statutory provisions which, when restated by Parliament in the 1990 Act, repeat-

Mr Timothy Straker, QC and Mr Ramit Bhose for the council. ed identical expressions which had been used and defined in the earlibeen used and defined in the earli-er public health legislation, and which had also been the subject of judicial interpretation settled for over a century.

The judge was right in holding that the kind of problem raised by the steep internal staircase, with its attendant dangers of accident or physical injury, did not fall within the category of injury addressed by Part III of the 1990 Act, when propthe earlier statutory provisions.

As the judge had said, the problem of accidental physical injury existed as much in the mid-nine-teenth century as it did today. But it was not the problem of which it was not she problem at which those statutory provisions and their predecessors were directed.

Mr Straker's review of the legis-lative history had shown that the expression "injurious or likely to cause injury to health" had been repeatedly used by Parliament in the context of what had been characterised as "sanitary stantes".

There were distinct statutory provisions relating to dangerous and dilapidated buildings, such as were now to be found in the Build-ing Act 1984, the Housing Act 1985, the Landlord and Tenant Act 1985 and the Defective Premises Act 1972.

When restating the law of statutory nuisances in the 1990 Act Parliament had used the same expression "injury to health" that it had used in the earlier legislation. That expression had been interpreted and applied by the courts for over a century in a sense which did not cover accidental physical injury. In those circumstances it was probable that Parliament intended (a) to produce the same result in 1990 Acr as had been produced un-der the equivalent provisions of the earlier public health Acts and (b) to leave the risk of injury by accident to be deait with by local authorities under other available statutory powers in measures such as the Building Act 1984 and the building regulations.

As to the council's power to with draw the abatement notice, if the judge was wrong, which he was not, on the main point, there was no error in his conclusion that the council had an implied power to do so which it had exercised lawfully. Lord Justice Buxton gave a concurring judgment and Lord Justice Hirst agreed with both.

MR JUSTICE MOSES said that the profits of the applicant company were eligible under section 13 of the 1988 Act for small companies tax relief, but that relief was halved where the applicant had an associated company.

Section 13(4) provided that a company was associated to another where both were under the control of the same person(s) as de-fined by section 416 of that ACL

The applicant company was con-trolled by trustees of the late Mr Walker's will trust, and Lawrec Properties Ltd was controlled by the trustees of Mr Walker's discretionary trust.
Mrs Walker, the widow of Mr

Walker, was the settlor of the disretionary trust and had a life inter-est under the will trust, which meant that the trustees of both trusts were her associates. The Inland Revenue found that it was bound by section 416(6) of the 1988 Act to exercise the power to auribute to her the rights and powers of her associates, the trustees,

The applicant argued that it did. and that the power ought not to be exercised because it was unfair to regard Mrs Walker as having control over Lawrec Properties when she had no interest or could derive no benefit from it.

Woolls v Powling Before Lord Justice Hirst and Mr

[Judgment February 10] Where a conveyance was clear as to the boundary line between two properties, extrinsic evidence about the boundary line was not admissible. A plan of the land stated to be "for the purposes of identi-ed to be "for the purposes of identification only" could be used to determine where the boundary lay.

The Court of Appeal so held allowing an appeal from Mr Recorder Belben in Gloucester County Court dismissing the claim of the plaintiff, Douglas Edric Woolls, to a narrow strip of land between his property at Lofthouse, Upper Bourne, Brimscombe, Gloucester-shire, and that of the defendants, George James Powling, Elizabeth Robina Powling and Mark Stephen Powling.

MR JUSTICE CAZALET said the recorder had admitted evi-dence of oral exchanges at the pre-contract site meeting between plaintiff and desendants in 1972. The plaintiff contended that the recorder had misdirected himself in holding that the boundary line in

The recorder had based that de-cision on the fact that the parcels clause in the conveyance was expressed in general terms and the plan attached to the conveyance was said to be "for the purposes of was said to be not be purposes of identification only and was inaccurate in that it showed a right of way reserved by the plaintiff running over land which he claimed to have retained.

On that basis, purporting to follow Willson v Greene ([1971] I WLR 635), he bad admitted evidence of the circumstances in which the conveyance was made.

His Lordship referred to Wigginton and Milner Ltd v Winster Engi-neering Ltd ([1978] ! WLR 1462]. In that case Lord Justice Buckley had held that so long as the plan did not come imo conflict with anything which was explicit in the description of the parcels, the fact that it was said to "for the purposes of identification" did not exclude it from consideration in solving prob-lems left undecided by the explicit terms of the parcels clauses.

It would normally be made uilding trade that a price quoted for building work was exclusive of value-added tax, that custom did expressly clear.
It was in the interests of the not apply to contracts with consumbuilder to make it clear because, as ers and the inclusion or exclusion

If the builder failed to make it agreement to supply and erect an agricultural shed at the plaintiff's plain to the employer that he was stipulating payment of VAT in addition to the contract price, he would be left to account to the revemue for the VAT out of what he received. Tony Cox (Dismantlers) Ltd v Jim 5 Ltd ((1996) 13 Const L) 209) illustrated that there might well be a custom in the construc-tion industry that prices quoted were exclusive of VAT.

There was no evidence in the present case that on a contract beween a small builder seeking to be paid in cash and a part-time farmer it was an implied custom that VAT would be paid on top of the cash payments.

The officious bystander when asked whether the parties to a such a transaction intended that VAT should be paid on top of the cash payments, would say: "No. of course that was not the intention of the parties".

It had not been established that there was an express or implied term that VAT should be paid on top of the contract price. Lord Justice Roch agreed. Solicitors: Cartmell Shepherd

America's Cup hope hangs in balance

By EDWARD GORMAN, SAILING CORRESPONDENT

THE chances of a British yacht taking part in the 2000 America's Cup in Auckland this year remain in the balance as the Spirit of Britain syndicate continues a desperate search for commercial

The syndicate, which has registered an entry into the Louis Vuitton Challenger Selection Series that begins in Auckland in October, is in the extraordinary situation of having started to build a multimillion pound America's Cup class yacht, even though it is not certain that the funds will be in place. Professor Andrew Graves of Bath University, the chairman of the syndicate, said yesterday that, contrary to speculation, his efforts have not collapsed. He remains optimistic that a British crew can take part in the Cup for the first time in 12 years.

He said it was hoped that work on one Ian Howlettdesigned hull at Portland in Dorset and would be finished by July. However, up to £2 million is still required to finish the boat and Graves acknowledged that the plug could be pulled if the money is not found. "We could stop it."

Graves still believes that Lawrie Smith will be able to challengers. "I think we have a much better than 50-50 chance but, as you know, these things swing very quickly," he said. "It doesn't take much to take people's confidence away. But we're confident that we have a product that will be successful and will build for the future, not just for 2000." He went on to reiterate his belief that British sailing must be represented at what is regarded by many as the most prestigious competition in world sailing. "It is absolutely vital for British sailing, because this is the blue riband event," Graves said, "If we are to be taken seriously as a global sailing nation, we have to be at the America's Cup. I extraordinary if British industry and commerce couldn't find the ability to support such a challenge, particularly as we are in such great shape on the technical and sailing side."

While commercial backers

in the United States have been found to support five challeng-ers and there are strong syndicates from France, Italy, Spain, Japan and, almost certainly, Switzerland, the going in Britain has been tough. After three years of searching, the campaign is still struggling to get off the ground, while several potential rivals have been testing in Auckland for months.

The Spirit effort appeared to be coming to a successful conclusion over Christmas until a group of potential sponsors turned out not to be prepared to commit financially and dropped out. Since then the search has concentrated on private individuals and banks willing to underwrite costs in advance of a major sponsor signing on the dotted line.

Graves blames what he called the poor state of the British economy, the economic crisis in Asia and the limited appeal of New Zealand, remote in both distance and time from Europe, for the reluctance of British companies to back his effort. ☐ In the Around Alone Race.

Mike Garside, in Magellan Alpha, yesterday crossed the finish line at Punte del Este to take second place in Class 2 for the third leg. Garside finished 16 hours behind JP Mouligne of France, in Cray Valley, the class leader, who has won all three legs so far and has an overall lead on Garside of almost eight days.

Rios takes his chances on comeback

THE phoney war is over and it is time for the big guns to roll into town for the start of the Newsweek Champions' Cup. Quite what state they are in. though, is anyone's guess. Andre Agassi, seeded No 9, has a tweaked hamstring after his efforts in Scottsdale last week and Marcelo Rios, the sixth seed, is coming to terms with life in a corset as he makes his comeback from a back injury that has kept him off the courts for two months. He has been practising gently for the past couple of days, trying light workouts on the hard courts, the clay and, yesterday, even on the grass. Each time he straps on the large plastic support that resembles the body armour of a Roman centurion. wrapping it around his hips and waist Once inside, the movement is limited and he seems unwilling to push himself too far.

Rios won here last year and went on to take the Lipton title immediately afterwards, so to lose early on at one or both events this time around could FROM ALIX RAMSAY IN INDIAN WELLS, CALIFORNIA cost him his place in the top ten. Not that he seems too concerned. "I'm going to try to play, start slow, just try to rally some balls," he said. "It's bad luck that the first tournament I play is the one I won last year, but I can't do anything about it.

The mere fact that he is here at all Is enough to make Rios happy. The stress fracture of a vertebra in the lower back could have taken longer to heal and now Rios is looking to reduce his schedule to keep it from happening again. "It was five weeks before I could play any tennis and I was just doing exercise and trying to recover," he said. "But I was really slow, I couldn't hit any balls or even move."

What appears to worry him most is the state of his golf game. Unable to play for months, his handicap has suffered and he is wary of returning to the tee. "I'm really kind of scared coming back again. I think it's going to take a while," he said.

It is not just Rios who has his eyes on the rankings - four of the top men could overtake Pete Sampras for the No I spot this week, even if the calculations are complex. Yevgeny Kafelnikov needs to reach the semi-finals to go top, Alex Corretja and Carlos Moya would have to reach the final and Pat Rafter needs to win the title. The present incumbent is already here and appears to be in remarkably jovial mood — by his standards — but not

Davis Cup. While Britain ponders the possibili-ty of victory against the United States next month and has at least the backbone of the team in place — Henman, Rusedski and A. N. Other — the Americans seem to be overwhelmed by apathy. Sampras and Agassi have ruled themselves out and Michael Chang. says that it would take a miracle for

Jim Courier, a possible contender

depending on how he is feeling and on his form this week, has made his opin-ions on Sampras's decision clear. "I find it ironic," he said. "I think what are you playing for? Did the public get that excited when he won Wimbledon for the fifth time?

"They certainly weren't in America and his success didn't get published in any major publication in America, but he seems to find that important. And if you are playing for media coverage. I think you are playing for the wrong reasons."

Rusedski was due to take on Petr Korda last night. The last time the two met was at Battersea Park a couple of weeks ago and, even if that was indoors and on home territory, he should get a similar favourable result.

Impressive Pang heads for meeting with Ebdon

FROM PHIL YATES IN SHANGHAI

THE opening day of the China International at the IC Mandarin Hotel here was notable for exceptional crowd interest, a reported black market in tickets, and for a high-quality performance by Pang Well
Guo, a local wild-card enuy.
Not since 1990, when Stephen Hendry beat Dennis
Taylor in the final of the Asian

Taylor in the final of the Asian Open in Guangzhou, has China hosted a world-ranking tournament. During the intervening years, the popularity of the game has boomed and this was reflected in healthy crowds for all three sessions.

There was even a home victory to cheer, or to clap in the case of these most polite of spectators, when Pang, who made such a good impression at the 1996 World Cup. performed superbly to bear Peter Lines, of Leeds, 5-1 in the wild card play-off round.

Pang, a bespeciacled left-hander who is arguably China's best player, impres-sively secured a meeting with. Peter Ebdon in the last 32 by compiling breaks of 63, 42, 104, 50 and 79. Indeed, he should have been joined in the first round proper by his compatriot. Zhang Xai. Zhang led Anthony Davies 4-1 but. with a match against Hendry at stake, collapsed as the winning line approached.
Ronnie O'Sullivan reached the last 16 by beating Bradley Jones 5-3 but a cavalier amitude, which bordered on the reckless, demonstrated his disenchantment. O'Sullivan pulled away from a score of 3-3 with two rapidly-compiled breaks of 55 and 81. "I'm not really into it to be honest, I'm just going through the mo-tions," O'Sullivan said.

Tony Drago's hopes of remaining amongst the elite top 16 in the world rankings next season suffered further serious damage when he was whitewashed 5-0 by Paul Davies in only 76 minutes. Drago was also beaten in the first round of the Thailand Masters in Bangkok last week.

Foster surges out of sight

BY DAVID RHYS JONES

PAUL FOSTER, the 1998 world indoor singles champion, produced a devastating spell of scoring at Bournemouth yesterday, when he surged from 6-6 into a virtually unbeatable 20-6 lead over the Welsh champion, Mark Anstey, from Merthyr Tydfil, and earned a place in the British indoor singles final.

Anstey kept Foster waiting for another six ends, however, as he closed to 20-14, at which stage Foster lost his patience, switched to firm tactics, and ditched the jack for the winning single. In the final today, Foster meets the English champion, Jamie Mills, from the South Forest Club, who beat Paul Daly, of Belfast, 21-15.

Steve Ovett's nephew, Ollie Ovett, broke into an athletic trot after his last bowl in the Under-25 singles semi-final against Simon Martin, Daly's Belfast clubmate. The bowl was worth following. With it Ovett, like Foster, ditched the jack, and turned a difficult adverse position into two shots - enough to give him a 21-8 victory and set up a final encounter with Darren Burnett, the world junior champion.

The most outrageous escape was effected by three Devonians, Roy Johnson, Danny Denison and John Wickham, who are representing Newton Abbot's Teignbridge club, even though Denison and Wickham now belong to Torquay

The Teignbridge trio were never ahead at any stage during the match, but a count of six on the twelfth end, and two successive late singles, enabled them to tie, 19-19, after the allotted 18 ends, and they grabbed a last single on the tense extra end. Graham Dennis and Martyn Roberts, the Welsh pairs champions, defeated their English counterparts, Alan Springell and Gary Grace, 28-15.

Irvine's moment of triumph dismissed as flash in the pan

JEAN TODT is easily irritated when his strategy to bring Ferrari the Formula One world championship is questioned. He has got the Italian team to within touching distance of the crown in the past two years by using Michael Schumacher as his point of attack and, when Eddie Irvine reioins his team-mates later this month, he will discover that nothing has been changed by his victory in the Australian

Grand Prix. Todt, Ferrari's team manager, had nothing but praise for Irvine yesterday, acknowledging that his maiden win in Melbourne on Sunday will help ease the frustration of a driver whose role for three years has been as supporting challenges. However, Toot is nothing if not a praematist and knows that one victory does not necessarily make a champion in Formula One. John Watson, the last winning Irish driver, was among the first to press Toot to change his strategy and allow Irvine off his leash, starting at the next race in Brazil in five weeks' time. He said: "He must encour-Todt listened to the arguments, but the Frenchman simply pointed out: "The championship is just starting. The next appointment is in Brazil and I hope Eddie can win there. If he wins the next five or six races and is more than 50 points ahead of the other drivers, then somebody can raise the question of our strategy. We are always under pressure at Ferrari but we have to live with it, and the only answer is to get results. This was a very good result for Eddie, but tomorrow is another day." Schumacher can rarely have suffered a day like Sun-day when his luck spiralled from bad to atrocious. It began when he could not engage first gear at the start, continued with a puncture and more gearbox problems and ended without a champion-drivers breaking down again in the same race must be negli-gible. David Coulthard. whose McLaren Mercedes lasted only 13 laps, believes that Irvine has had his day of glory and that the real battle remains between him, his team-mate, Mika Hakkinen, and Schumacher. "In many ways, it ended up a perfect result for us because Michael didn't win any points and it is Michael who presents the main threat," Coulthard said. "With us not finishing, the only bad news was that Ferrari got ten points in the constructors' championship. I don't think that Eddie will be able to sustain a season-long challenee." So it seems that Irvine's victory, immensely satisfying though it was for a talented driver who had waited 82 races to get to the top step of the podium, is being regarded for the moment as irrelevant to the real issues of the season.

BADMINTON

Ong leads list of casualties

INJURIES have deprived the Yonex Ail-England champion-ships of two of the leading contenders in its centenary tournament which starts at the National Indoor Arena, Birmingham tomorrow (Richard Eaton writes). Ong Ewe Hock, the runnerup last year, has withdrawn with a badly swollen thigh and Yong Hock Kin, the Indonesian Open champion, has pulled out because of a virus that has been spreading around his home near Knala Lumpur and is said to have caused as many as 30 deaths.

Both Malaysians were seeded and had been hoping to challenge for the title held by Sun Jun, of China. Another withdrawal yesterday was Darren Hall, of England, the ten-times national champion, who has been hampered by a persistent ankle injury.

Midnight Legend, a Champion Hurdle possible, heads the weights but even if David Nicholson's runner bypasses Esher, the weights will not rise too much as Pipe also has Challenger Du Luc entered in the race.

Best known for his mercurial exploits as a three-rolle chaser, the nine-year-old is still rated 145 over the smaller obstacles and his presence at the head of the handicap would ensure a decent racing weight for Pine's other entries notably Dr Jazz.

The seven-year-old won the Barry Hills-trained hurd-over II furlongs on the Flat in ling newcomer who was third New Zealand, as well as being successful three times over hurdies. ### RESULTS FROM YESTERDAY'S THREE MEETINGS

has Sunderlands installed Dr

Jazz as 5-1 joint-favourite, but

Ballysicyos, who won on his British debut for Pipe two weeks ago at Ludlow, is 6-l.

Sunderlands beis: 5-1 Dr Jazz,

In Question, 6-1 Ballysicyos,

10-1 Sir Talbot, 11-1 Alabang,

Davoski, Serenus, 12-1 Regency Lake, Road Racer, 14-1 bar.

season just over two weeks

Stag, trained by Philip Mitch-ell at Epsom, is offering half of his Dubai World Cup runner

(about £620,000) price tag. Godolphin is likely to have

race run at Nad Al Sheba on March 28, and Simon Crisford

confirmed yesterday that Frankie Dettori will ride

High-Rise, winner of the Epsom Derby last season.

Meanwhile, the announcement that Anthony Stroud is

Mohammed's racing manager and is not being replaced at Darley Stud underlines the streamlining taking place withing the sheikh's racing empire.

It is now clear that the highly successful Godolphin opera-

Sheikh's racing operation, while Darley Stud will concentrate on breeding.

Contract: Six Clubs doubled by South. Lead: ace of spade mond finesse he leads the discussed the peculiar bidding in the earlier article. After ruffing the spade Colin Simpson crossed to dummy with a club. He then carefully played a diamond to the queen. When that held he could draw the other trump, and run the ten of diamonds. I pointed out the importance of the early diamond finesse - if declarer draws both trumps before tackling dia-monds, he cannot pick up

I stated that if West was void in diamonds the contract was not makable. That is correct if declarer draws two trumps immediately, but Roger Pechey of Beckenham, Kent, and Garth Saunders of Ferndown, Dorset, point out that declarer can do better. At trick two he plays a club, but instead of taking the dia-

queen of spades and discards a heart on it. When he regains the lead he draws the last trump, cashes the jack of spades discarding the jack of diamonds, and finally runs the ten of diamonds. This is an improvement on Simpson's line, in that it brings the contract home even if West has no diamonds. The winners of the Ranked Pairs, played in Coventry at the weekend, were: Ted Reveley and David Stevenson (Grand): Megan and Mel Starkings (Premier Life): Peter Fountain and Jo Skillern (Life); Chris Potter and John Yuil (National); Jaivan Patel and Tim Glover (Regional); and Peter Kaufmann and Harry Silverman (Master).

Victory clinched

With a win in the twelfth round against Michael Ad-ams, of England, Garry Kasparov, the world champion, has, remarkably, already clinched victory with two rounds to go in the elite tournament at Linares in Spain.

The game was, in fact, a dis-aster for the English grandmaster, who seemed on the verge of inflicting Kasparov's first defeat on him. However. Adams lost his way and eventually succumbed.

Briton will knuckle down to task but faces awesome prospect in Garden of American pugilistic acclaim

Determined Lewis takes on weight of history

FROM ROB HUGHES, CHIEF SPORTS WRITER

TRY AS he might to brainwash himself into believing that he is a few strides from his ring of destiny. Lennox Lewis faces an overwhelming historical as well as physical and mental assignment at Madison Square Garden on Saturday night. The week here has begun with a northerly wind that chills folks to the marrow, and with the conviction that, if Lewis is to topple Evander Holyfield for the undisputed heavyweight championship of the world. the task is on a scale as high as the tallest buildings even here in New York City.

We can feel the intensity rising. Lewis is reaching for something that no Britishthis century. The last - indeed only - Englishman to have been undisputed heavyweight champion of the world can only now be viewed in sepia. for it was the year 1897 when Bob Fitzsimmons, born in Helston, Cornwall, won it in 1879. He held the belt for two years and, in the century that followed. 12 Britons have dared to try. 12 have fallen in the pursuit.

Not even Fitzsimmons did it the Garden of American pugilistic acclaim. There will be 20.000 fanatics around the Madison Square ring on Saturday. Lewis says he will shut them out, keep his cool, his focus, almost block reality out of his mind. Good luck to him. but Holyfield is reality older opponent, wiser in the ways of ringcraft, a warrior of

They are both wealthy men. worth around US$200 million between them, so hunger is not the core of their motivation. Neither sidesteps the terrifying implications of assault and battery, or the medical repercussion that make some of us look at Muham-quences each time such gladiators, both over the age of athletic prime, do battle. "I do intend to batter him senseless." Lewis has said. The phrase is as chilling as the wind. Yet on both sides of the Atlantic, the fever builds. We are drawn to this base primal instinct, even if half our brain questions the sanity and the validity of organised brainbeating as entertainment. But we look back through the annals of boxing - was it ever a noble art? — to appreciate what Lewis, in his search for respect", is attempting.

The Americanism "awe some" comes to mind. Only three men from Europe have won the world heavyweight championship, and just six non-Americans have wrested the heavyweight belt from United States fighters since records began. The sport no, the business — has passed into a period of understandable black domination and the initiation of spurious titles has belittled the voracity of the claim to be world champion.

So, alas, we must exclude some Britons who have been pretenders to world heavyweight belt-holders. We have no choice but to acknowledge that what Lewis has won so far, what Frank Bruno and Herbie Hide, Henry Akinwande and - for heaven's sake - Johnny Nelson picked up were only pieces of the CINTURE SOUTHS.

The "unification" contest on Saturday is the first in the heavyweight division for eight years. Lewis might take inspiration from certain portents. ldes of March perhaps. Bob Fitzsimmons, like Lewis, was a man who left England in childhood to come back with a strange accent and with the grooming, the toughness that possibly the British welfare system has never bred into the heaviest of men.

Fitzsimmons, though, was not remotely of Lewis's physi-cal stature. He had sailed from Cornwall to settle in New Zealand, to learn to box in Australia, to become an American citizen by the time his day of destiny dawned, in Carson City on March 17, 1897. He is described in the history books as balding, spindly and weighing just 1671b (barely 12st).

Lewis, born a Londoner but an Olympic Games gold medal-winner for Canada, to where he and his mother moved, scales one and a half times that of Fitzsimmons and, at 240lb and 6ft 51/2in, he almost dwarfs Holyfield.

But if they are half-British, they are two of a kind. Alienation hardens the soul, and though Lewis is most often accompanied by Violet, his Mum, doubtless he has read that it was feminine advice that helped Fitzsimmons to dethrone James J Corbett. "Hit him in the slats, Bob!" yelled the apparently uncompromising Mrs Rose Fitzsimmons when her man, at 34 a year older than Lewis is now, landed the crucial solar-plexus blow that finished off Corbett in round 14.

Fitzsimmons was to fight on until he was 52, a freak who won world crowns at three weights with his bare knuckles. In his ideal, Lewis should never be tempted to fight to such a vulnerable age and. doubtless in his search for respect, would not want to hit a man so hard or so low. But we fool ourselves if we dress up the modern theatre of boxing as any less primitive or hurtful or, to women as much as to men, somehow fiercely compelling. Holyfield can talk to us of Christ and Lewis can shield, as he does, his personal life from publicity. Don King, the promoter, can abuse our senses, but no one should enter this weekend thinking boxing is a cleansed pastime. The sweat and toil of 102 fruit-less years, in which English-men of the sporting demean-our of Henry Cooper to the rather more basic approach of Joe Bugner, or Bruno or Brian London, know that heart is simply not sufficient in the American garden where our man is taking on more than the fight over bananas.

History shows that one man alone, Tommy Farr from Tonypandy, really impressed the Americans at Madison Square Garden. He fought the inestimable Joe Louis for 15 rounds and lost on points 62 years ago, but conceded noth-

Otherwise, this arena, which has passed from Barnum and Bailey to the deeds of Ali and Frazier, has remained remorselessly US territory. The chill returns — and Lennox Claudius Lewis has a few more days to try to kid er fight in another arena.

He has long said that the champions were avoiding. him, that his powerful right hand would destroy Holyfield. Laconically, the Texan had replied when the contract was sealed last autumn: "Now we shall see how he (Lewis) holds up when he gets what he's been asking for."

The ring of destiny, indeed.

All very satisfactory -except that the foremost boxing venue in the world has a night off, apparently, Damn. I can't even go and ask how much for a ringside ticket to Holyfield-Lewis, to test how Americans never know when you're joking.

But what's this? A sign of life. "Welcome" blazes a colourful neon sign outside the Garden. Welcome to Arie Bedell's Bar Mitzvah." The woman paws feebly at a ocked glass door, studies a timetable of Knicks events, and listens in vain on the sort of genteci event deemed a disaster (not a triumph) if haif the participants do not go home spattered with blood.

Preparing for the Holyfield-Lewis fight has been an interesting exercise for a person mainly repulsed by boxing. As I trekked back uptown to my hotel, I had time to think about it. I mean, this "unification" is massively significant, right? A bit like the unification of Italy, only quicker? Yet it will still involve two each other on the head with fists like demolition balls. The fighters have heroic strengths and flaws; one an exhausted overachiever, the other a wilfully migmatic underachiever. Yet the point of the contest is to "settle it", and unfortunately you don't settle world heavyweight champion-ships by thrashing it out over

Yes, the main thing about this fight is it's going to hap-pen. Come Saturday night, there will be a ding-ding at mugged up at home last week said. "You are a woman equal to finding a place to park at White Hart Lane! You are made of stern stuff! So I watched the Oscar-win

So I approach the whole thing with a Cassandra-ish alarm, struck by the force of its simple inevitability. Cry woo as much as you like, it's like being in the path of a train. Evander Holyfield and Lennox Lewis — two menwith designs on each other's living daylights - will meet each other on Saturday night head-on, and that's that.

world has all those growled apocalyptic overtones of Judgement Night and "Armageddon Afternoon". This thing is just as unavoidable now for the people concerned as Arie Bedell's Bar Mitzvah was for him. We can only pray (know what I mean. Harry?) that Holyfield and Lewis don't similarly overdo the chopped liver.

It may be early days but one conclusion that could be drawn is that the gap in interpretation of the laws between the hemispheres has at last closed and that, just in time for the World Cup this autumn, a giobal approach has been adopted.

Statistics for last season had already hinted at that, in any case; they showed that, no matter from which hemisphere the referee came, the stoppage counts were nearly the same.

Over the weekend Fleming. from Scotland, was as strict in the application of law 18 - the tackle law - as was O'Brien, his New Zealand counterpart. because they, like their colleagues on the merit-based panel established by the International Rugby Board (IRB), are determined to apply the charter for playing the game issued by the board in 1997 and keep players on their feet. The initial problem was the Already this year, however, there have been complaints that Super 12 matches are being refereed differently, that scorelines — and crowds — are down; in fact, the tournament is probably being refereed according to the laws. Yesterday a High Court judge granted the club's application to go into administration, which effectively enables them to continue trading and gives Hallett breathing space to seek new investment. Hallett said: "We can finance ourselves until the end of the season but need £2 million after that to keep the players together. That has to be the priority.

Anfield schooling hones Bradford Jewell

PAUL JEWELL, the manager of Bradford City, admits that he "probably bores people to death" with recollections of his early playing days at Liver-pool. But what he learnt is finally coming good, and if it helps Bradford to an unlikely promotion this season, the peo-ple of West Yorkshire will not be able to get enough of Pais-ley, Dalglish, Rush, et al. Jewell has endured a steep learning curve since taking on the job at Valley Parade at the end of last season and, tonight, the ambition of he and his team faces its toughest single test; a visit from Sunderland, the Nationwide League first division leaders.

It is one of another round of fascinating matches in the first division programme. At least ten clubs have realistic hopes of earning promotion to the FA Carling Premiership. Whatever the outcome, Jewell has experienced an about-turn in fortunes that few predicted. After a summer spent strengthening the squad, Jewell and Bradford garnered five points from seven games. # Swift end for Farry at Hampden

ation's (SFA) chief executive was dismissed from his job at the famous old ground whose rebirth he had overseen, after being found guilty of negli-gence in the Jorge Cadete transfer affair. His errors cost the SFA more than £130,000, plus legal costs, after they had to settle a compensation claim with Celtic. Celtic had waged a three-year battle to prove that Farry had delayed Cad-ete's move from Sporting Lisbon, which they claimed prevented them from using the Portugal forward in key league and cup games in the run-in to 1995-96 season.

Farry was not allowed to attend the SFA full council meeting at Hampden which decided his fate. Only the 49 members filed into the stadium which Farry had striven to revamp from a crumbling wreck into a modern £60 million arena. Indeed, Farry, 44, would have been expected to present the Scottish Cup there in just 11 weeks, when the cup final returns to Hampden after three years.

However, a previous cup final appearance perhaps indicated how the general football public would have reacted to Farry's exit yesterday. He was jeered by the crowd at the Kilmarnock-Falkirk final after declaring that neither side would be allowed to celebrate in front of their fans. Tabloid newspapers dubbed him the most hated man in Scottish football" and, while he had a

that his pompous language and killjoy attitude combined to ensure he was not a man of the people.

He achieved greater contempt outside football in Sep-tember 1997 when he refused to change the timing of Scotland's World Cup qualifying tie at home to Belarus, which clashed with the funeral of Diana, Princess of Wales, although the game was subsequently postponed for 24 hours. In fairness, Farry was dry wit, there was little doubt a prisoner of world football bureaucracy on that occasion. Farry, though, did not court friends, particularly with either of the powerful Old Firm clubs. His decision to hold on to Hampden as Scotland's national stadium upset both Celtic and Rangers, who had invested millions of pounds in rebuilding Celtic Park and Ibrox.

However, Farry's downfall was to continue the SFA's long history of acting in a dictatorial manner, and when he crossed swords with Fergus

McCann once too often the Celtic chairman fixed Farry in his sights and used the Cadete

"negligence" as ammunition.
It took only an hour yesterday for the full committee to endorse a decision made by the executive committee last Friday that Farry's contract be terminated. Farry, who claims his faxes to the SFA in the last week seeking a chance to explain were ignored, says he had fresh evidence to present. Celtic, for one, would be greatly interested in why such evidence did not surface over the past three years.

Tony Higgins, the secretary of the players' union, said yesterday: "Anyone who knows Jim Farry knows that rules are adhered to strictly. So it is surprising that rules have been his downfall."

While Jack McGinn, the SFA president, will take temporary charge, the task of finding a successor is unlikely to be easy. Campbell Ogilvie, Rangers' secretary-director, a skilled admistrator who influenced the creation of the Champions' League, is the favoured choice.

However, David Murray, the Rangers chairman, said: While I can recognise why many other bodies may wish to employ him [Ogilvie], Rangers would not even consider letting him go."

Other contenders could be Roger Mitchell, the chief executive of the Scottish Premier League, and Peter Donald, who succeeded Farry at the Scottish League in 1990.

Ronaldo makes welcome return for Inter

Internazionale, their European Cup quarter-final opponents, signalled the beginning of the comeback of Ronaldo by including him in their squad to face Parma in Serie A tonight.

Ronaldo, who has been absent for more than six weeks with a knee injury, has not been involved in any of Inter's recent plans and did not even travel to Old Trafford. He will, however, be among the 20-man party that goes to Parma as they try to restore morale following their first-leg defeat to United and a 1-0 loss at home to Bari on Sunday. They have now slipped to seventh in Serie A, 16 points behind the leaders, Lazio.

cleared yesterday for the rebuilding of Wembley Stadium, the key element in England's bid for the 2006 World Cup and 2003 athletics world charmoneships

The chairman and executive directors of Wembley plc decided to press ahead with the shareholders vote at an extraordinary general meet-ing to sell the national stadium, despite a last-minute conditional cash offer from SFX, an American sports promotion company.

SFX wanted to delay the meeting by 30 days to consider making a formal proposal to acquire Wembley plc for £218 million while it vetted the company's books. However, the board is worried that the £106-million offer for the stadium alone from the English National Sta-dium Development Company, a joint venture between the English Sports Council and the Football Association, will lanse on March 15.

Last mouth Alec McGivan, the director of the 2006 World Cup campaign, had said he did not want any further delay because it might damage England's hopes of staging the tournament.
The FA has to meet a deadline of July this year to provide written details of the bid to Fifa, the world governing body for football, and that must include complete details of the new national stadium, which would hold many of the matches in 2006, including the final. A decision on the location of the 2003 world athletics championships will be made in November.

The chairman and executive directors of Wembley plc said after a board meeting yesterday that it continued to consider that it is in "the best interests" of the company to proceed with the sale of the stadi-

Meanwhile, Irvin Khoza, the chairman of the South African bid committee, said yesterday that he believes that Germany is favourite to be hosts for the tournament unless South Africa reduces its number of candidates from five to one. A decision will be made in March 2000.

Wenger looking upwards

AS THE FA Carling Premiership title race gathers momenturn, the mind games have started. On Sunday, Alex Ferguson, the Manchester United manager, and Giantuca Vialli, the Chelsea player-manager. suggested that the balance had shifted in Arsenal's favour. Yesterday, Arsène Wenger, the Arsenal manager, said that he would rather be in United's position, leading the way. It means little in the long run — only points mean prizes enviously in the direction of Arsenal, the champions, after United and Chelsea had drawn 0-0 in their FA Cup quarter-final at Old Trafford, requiring a second meeting at Stamford Bridge tomorrow. United still hold the upper hand in the Premiership, four points in front of Chelsea and seven clear of Arsenal, who both have a game in hand. If Arsenal overcome Wednesday - one of only three sides to beat them in the league this season - they will leapfrog Chelsea on goal difference.

By naming Williams, Woods has silenced the

After 27 fixtures last season. Arsenal trailed United by nine points but had three games in hand. They then won nine successive matches to clinch the championship. "Our position is more difficult than last year," Wenger said. "We have the advantage of knowing we can do it but United and Chelsea have so much experience. We shall see."

Cambridge Oxford are look for short of old magic

By Sydney Friskin

TWENTY years have passed since David Westcott led Oxford to a crushing 6-1 victory over Cambridge in the annual men's University match at Lord's. The event was moved to Reading in 1991 and now, for the third year in succession, it is to be played today at Milton Keynes, the 99th match of the series. In 1997 Cambridge broke a six-year sequence of Oxford's successes by winning 2-0, but last year Oxford recovered the treasured trophy with a 4-0 victory. The consensus is that it will be a more closelyfought contest this time.

Both teams completed their preparation over the weekend, Oxford with a 3-1 victory over Isca in the Nationa League first division to mark the official opening of their artificial turf pitch at liftley Road. But earlier Oxford had achieved a more significant 3-2 win over Lewes, who had reached the quarter-finals of the EHA Cup before losing 4-3 to Cannock. Cambridge drew 2-2 against Crostyx in the East League premier division and are third in the table, but they can take comfort from their 5-3 victory over the Army, who held Oxford goalless in the TIGER WOODS ended two weeks of speculation yesterday when he named the man who will take over from Mike "Fluff" Cowan, his caddie for the past 2½ years. The man who will pick up probably the most lucrative caddying job in golf is Steve Williams, who has worked for Greg Norman.

and more recently Ray Floyd. Woods's announcement put an end to the speculation that has been rife since Bryon Bell, a 23-year-old schoolfriend of Woods, carried Woods's bag during a strokeplay event in San Diego last month. It was the first time since Woods turned professional in August 1996 that he had not used Cowan. IF THE number of Blues is a guide, Cambridge, with II in their squad, should start the annual women's University match at Milton Keynes today as firm favourites to retain the trophy for the fourth year running. Oxford have only five in their line-up.

Both captains admit that winning is important, but there is a little more to this occasion than collecting a trophy. Since the inaugural match at Wimbledon Common in 1894 the women have rarely been given a share of the spotlight and the fixture was all too often relegated to an unfashionable venue on a date which clashed with National League games:

That is, until last year when the men's and women's matches were staged on the same day at the National Stadium. The initiative met with universal approval, helping the women gain much-needed respectability and adding prestige and atmosphere to the day.

More lottery gold for medals

ATHLETICS CORRESPONDENT IN MAEBASHI, JAPAN

BRITISH athletics, enjoying the returns of its success. expects to receive some £IS million over the next six years from National Lottery sports funding in an attempt to maintain the boom period.

Max Jones, the Great Britain performance director, said here after the country's best performance in the world indoor championships that the rich harvest of success last year had been influential in the £2.4 million funding received in the past being increased to about 53 million a

Jones submitted ambitious targets for British medal success as part of his performance

Did this not bring pressure to his job? he was asked. "I would rather have pressure than no money." he replied. For three million a year, they should expect to get something back in the long term."

Britain won nine gold medals at the European championships in Budapest last summer and three in Maebashi with a squad missing a great many of its stars. "Everybody was saying that last year was a European year." Jones said. indicating that some people had doubted Britain's ability to succeed on the world stage.

"Coming here and winning world medals was psychologically a very good thing for all of us. It sets it up nicely for the summer, like Valencia did last year." The European indoor championships in Valencia started the ball rolling, quickly followed by team and individual medals at the world crosscountry championships.

The team for Maebashi had fine-tuned at a pre-championships camp in Nihon and some had spent time warmweather training in Australia.

The gold medal winners Ashia Hansen, Colin Jackson and Jamie Baulch| have either been in Australia or the Nihon centre." Jones said. "It is the

Though 16 championship records were witnessed, the occasion drew poor crowds. This is the third International Amateur Athletic Federation (IAAF) world series event in succession which has played to a small audience, after the grand prix final in Moscow and the World Cup in Johannesburg.

The IAAF, which has set out a strategy of taking its world outdoor championships only to big cities where athletics is known to be popular, now needs to apply the thinking to its indoor event. At least Lisbon, where the next championships will be staged in 2001, should attract good crowds.

By then Birmingham may be put forward for the 2005 championships. It would have gone for 2003 but UK Athletics wants to concentrate on the London bid for the outdoor world championships that

When it came hack damaged it was the start of a one-woman campaign (backed by the AA) to take cowboy clampers to the courts and lobby the Government to bring in legislation for the security industry which would put an end to such nonsense. Excellent idea. Collingridge also gives short shrift to the author of Why Men Don't Listen and Women Can't Read Maps. Close Up: Jackson Pollock BBC2.9.30pm

BBC2. 9.30pm
"I want to express my feelings rather than illustrate them," murmurs the artist sometimes unkindly known as the Prince of Dribble, Paul Jackson Pollock. Partly because of his mould-breaking canvases — beautifully shown in this searching film — and partly because he seemed programmed to self-destruct — "like James Dean and Marilyn Monroe" — Pollock became an all-American icon. He died, drunk, in a car crash in 1956, aged 44. As a massive retrospective opens at the Tate Gallery in London, this tribute traces Pollock's career back to the Wyoming farm where he was born, through the fleshpots of New York and Los Angeles where he flourished, and along the rising then falling curve of his paintings.

The Budget

ionist Jackson Pollock (BBC2, 9.30pm)

Richard Lumsden who plays anorak-clad cycle courier Henry. Henry is a loser. He hopelessly fancies the poised and lovely Clare (Lucy Akhurst) who lives with the poised and handsome Marshall (Greg Wise), who knocks over Henry's bike with his Porsche, which is how they meet. Silly Henry — it's so obvious that his real Miss Right is his best friend Heather (Miranda Pleasence; but that's for future episodes. Set in North London, and parily scored to music from Un Homme et une Femme it scored to music from Lin Homme et une Femme it all swims along fluidly. But do we need it?

The II O'Clock Show Channel 4, 11.10pm

Yesterday saw a compilation of last autumn's best bits from this satirical show and tonight a new series begins an eight-week, three-times-a-week run. Because it "provides up-to-the-minute comedy on breaking news stories and the big issues of the on breaking news stories and the big issues of the day" there is naturally no tape available for preview. But it was well received first time round so listen out for host lain Lee, with "voice of youth" All Gee, Tommy Vance with his "hard-hining News Slam" and American coverage from the resident reporter Rich Hall. The writers are too numerous to mention.

See listings Obviously the most important thing happening today is my annual gripe about coverage of the Budget, which occupies two and half hours on Radio 2 (Jimmy Young, 30m), two and three quarter hours on Radio 4 (Chris Lowe, 30m) and nearly four hours on Radio 5 Live (Peter Allen and Issae Carpers 2 (Sept.) Talk Parkin and Charles EM Jane Garvey, 3.05pm). Talk Radio and Classic FM (oh yes) are also in the frame and perfectly entitled to be there, but what on earth is the BBC playing to be there, but what on earth is the BBC playing at? How does it justify nine hours of airtime on three networks devoted to Gordon Brown putting up the price of heer and fags? One could justify two BBC networks covering the Budget but surely not three? This gripe first appeared last year and will be repeated next year.

Decision time for troubled Derby

BY RICHARD HOBSON

THE internal conflict that has threatened to tear Derbyshire apart over the winter will end tonight if the club committee survives a vote of no confidence brought by a section of members. The general meeting has been moved to Pride Park, home of Derby County FC, because the County Ground does not have a room large enough to hold the expected attendance. Some 380 people, well over the fire safety limit, turned up at the annual meeting when David Griffin, who has organised the protest, handed over a petition calling for the removal of the committee. Though Dominic Cork has since withdrawn his request to leave over perceived interference on cricket matters, Griffin believes the issue has

Thus Trevor McDonald would give a taster of upcoming items, as in: "Did President Milosevic back down on Kosovo, or did he massacre more innocent civilians? Was anybody killed when a psycho opened fire in the middle of Manhatian this morning? Was Posh Spice's baby-born with complications, or not? Did Spurs beat Leicester City, or was it a draw, or did Leicester win? Or was the match postponed due to a waterlogged pitch? Stay tuned for the answers to all these questions." At 90 minutes, Kavanagh feels stretched, like a dinner for four that has been made to go round an extra couple of unemeded guests. It is always watchable, thanks to Thaw and the regulars at his cham-

Unlike the dismal Days Like These, The Grimleys has a tang of authenticity that goes beyond huge flares, terrible haircuis and a soundtrack consisting of the Bay City Rollers, Alvin Stardust and Slade, It has a cast that can act (Brian Conley's PE teacher is horribly plausible), and an opening episode that swiftly and deftly establishes who the characters are, what they are like and what they feel about

But none of this makes the sudden fascination with the 1970s any less perplexing. The clothes, the feather-cuts, and even the Dudley accents make for easy laughs. But surely there's only so much time you can spend wincing at the awfulness of 1970s taste, as if it were the scene of a particularly gruesome car crash.

McGrath brings West Indies to their knees in devastating finale to Test

Lara hits new depths of despair

FROM PAT GIBSON IN PORT OF SPAIN

Port of Spain (fourth day of five): Australia beat West Indies by 312 runs

ANYTHING can happen, it has been said, in Trinidad. Frogs whistle, birds speak French and oysters grow on trees, but no one expected to see the West Indies of Sobers and the three Ws. Richards and, ves. even Lara capitulate as pathetically as they did in the first Test against Australia here vesterday.

They were looking for flying pigs when the West Indies set off in pursuit of a victory target of 364. What they got was the sight of chickens coming home to roost as they col-lapsed pitifully to 51 all out. their lowest Test score.

The sublime notion was that they might be able to surpass their previous highest win-ning total of 348 for five against New Zealand at Auckland in 1968-69, when Seymour Nurse and Joey Carew both made hundreds.

The ridiculous reality was that they were hopelessly illequipped to cope with the fast bowling of Glenn McGrath, who took five for 28 to finish with ten for 78 in the match. and Jason Gillespie, who picked up four for 18. Shane Warne and Stuart MacGill. who were expected to be Australia's match-winners, did not even get a bowl.

At one stage, the West Indies were 16 for five and in real danger of falling short of the lowest Test total in history New Zealand's 26 against Len Humon's England side, at Auckland in 1954-55

As it was, they finished two runs short of their own previous lowest. 53 against Pakistan at Faisalabad in 1986-87. and they only got as many as they did because Australia

It was embarrassing to watch and impossible not to sympathise with Lara, whose first Test in what is effectively a two-match trial as West Indies captain had ended so

calamitously in front of his fellow countrymen.

"Cricket is my life." he said. "and I think it's important that before I retire that I lead the West Indies back on the way to the top. I experienced a bit of that success in the early part of my career and I don't want to for the rest of it. It is going to be tough for anyone to lead a team that is not successful but it's a great honour to captain the West Indies. It's also a job and it's got to be done.

"I am trying to cope with it. I think it will help if I can turn my fifties and sixties into hundreds. The team needs someone to star with the bat. We've been missing that for quite some time." The size of Lara's job is illustrated by the fact that the West past 14 Tests, seven under his captaincy. The bowling is still competitive enough, even though Courtney Walsh and Curtly Ambrose are coming to the end of their careers. Ambrose took his 355th wicket in Tests to become the joint eighth-highest wicket-taker alongside Australia's Dennis Lillee. The batting, however, is woeful. The latest opening pair, Sherwin Campbell and Suruj Ragoonath, the twelfth to have tried and failed since the great alliance between Gordon Greenidge and Desmond Havnes was broken up, could not lay a bat on McGrath and Gillespie for eight overs. Then Campbell hung out his bat at a ball from Gillespie, Mark Waugh took the catch at second slip the procession was under way. McGrath surprised Dave Joseph with a victous bouncer which he edged to first slip and Lara, having got off the mark with a confident pull off McGrath, got an even better ball from Gillespie that left

Jimmy Adams, who has been touted as an alternative captain, will be lucky to stay in the team after being hopeless-iy exposed by McGrath and Ragoonath was doing no more than hang on when Gillespie another leg-before decision. Roland Holder, batting with a runner because of an ankle injury, provided more easy pickfor Mark Waugh when he backed away from Mc-Grath and all the West Indies had left was a show of defiance from Ridley Jacobs before Mc-

Grath snared him as well. The innings was all over in 19.1 overs and 102 minutes and even Steve Waugh, elated as he was by Australia's compelling all-round performance in his first match as captain, had to admit: "We didn't expect it to be so easy. There was a slight lack of technique out

There will be no let-up from the champions ("We are the No I Test team in the world and we want to keep on proving it," Waugh said) and that is desperate news for the West Indies who do not seem to have anywhere to turn.

Decline initiated by Taylor's team

WHEN Australia last visited the Caribbean, the Test series was billed as a decider for the unofficial world championship. Four years on, the question is not whether West Indies will be beaten, but by how much.

Their decline can be traced to that controversial meeting in 1995. By securing a 2-1 success over the four matches, Australia brought to an end an unbeaten run stretching back 15 years and 29 series.

Any hopes in the Caribbean that defeat by Mark Taylor's side represented a temporary blip were soon discounted England, accustomed to 5-0 beatings there, held them to a 2-2 draw the following summer and in 1996 West Indies lost by 73 runs to Kenya in the World Cup. The next setback came in 1997 with a 3-0 series defeat by Pakistan, their first whitewash since 1928. When they lost 5-0 to South Africa this winter it appeared to represent their nadir - until they were dismissed for 51, their lowest total, by Australia yesterday. Of the West Indies side that lost by an innings in the deciding game four years ago. Richardson has not been replaced

Srikumar Sen in New York finds the American public finally taking

Evander Holyfield are stages of their preparations for their encounter for the undisputed heavyweight championship of the world. Lewis has set up his training headquarters in the Eighth Avenue Gym of the American Athletic Club, while Holyfield. appropriately, has gone to the Church Street gym near Wall Street. It sounds like the sort of gym that Father Flanagan would have run in the film Boys' Town, but it is in fact used by stockbrokers.

Whatever the outcome of the contest at Madison Square Garden on Saturday, Lewis can find satisfaction from the distinction of being the first British heavyweight to enter the ring as an equal of his American opponent.

Three of the other sell-outs were the heavy-weight contests between Ali and Oscar Bonavena in 1970. and the two Ali v Frazier bouts in 1971 and 1973. The gate receipts for this fight is the second highest of all time, $12 million (around £7.5 million). just $2 million short of the record held by the first fight between Mike Tyson and Holyfield in Las Vegas in 1996.

So great is the demand for tickets for Saturday's bout that it is reported that $1,500 seats are being offered at $4,000. Contests involving other British heavyweights, such as Henry Cooper and Frank Bruno, in their fights with Ali and Tyson respectively, generated huge interest for British sports enthusiasts, but the American public regarded them simply as one-sided affairs.

The most amazing aspect of the contest's success was pointed out by Emmanuel Steward. Lewis's trainer but who used to be in Holyfield's corner. He points out that neither Lewis nor Holyfield are crowd-pullers by themselves. "Lewis has not drawn big numbers because he hasn't fought big names, and Holyfield has only drawn big numbers because of the guys he fought, like George Foreman and Mike Tyson, and here we are with this fight breaking all records," Steward said. "For me it's the most important fight I have been involved in for ten years."

Steward added that he had turned down chances to work with Julio Cesar Chavez, Tyson, and Oscar de la Hoya to PEEL HOTELS
